CHAPTER II.

Her John Smith was the only man in the world to her.

She had had sense enough not to "wear her heart upon her sleeve for claws to peck at," to dress well and preserve her good looks, but she had never been happy.

She was one of the women who give affection its right value in life, and there was now no one in the world to love and caress her. She was, she said to herself, "an old maid of thirty." Youth was over, even if she had not faded very much, and she carried this thought with her up the elevator to the door of the office, at which she finally rapped with the handle of her pretty sun umbrella.

"Come in," said a voice; and she pushed the door open and entered.

"Well, you've been a deuce of a time getting here," said a gentleman who sat at a desk, and was becomingly stout and rather bald. "The next time—"

Here he wheeled about upon his chair and shook his finger violently at Miss Fredrica.

Then, blushing scarlet, sprung to his feet.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," he cried. "I fancied that it was my office-boy who entered. I am really mortified beyond expression. Pray take a seat."

And he offered her a chair, in which Fredrica sunk at once.

What had come over her? Usually, though shy, she was collected enough; but now she faltered and
