SAVED.

"Then you can never hope to love me!"

He had been pacing the floor nervously, but as he uttered these words he turned and faced the object of his remarks

"Mr. Clinton," replied the beautiful girl he addressed, "much as I regret to pain you, I fear the demands upon my time are so great as to preclude the possibility of devoting enough of my attention to the subject which you have mentioned. As president of the New Woman's Advancement Club, as editor of the Bloomer, with the prospect of soon going on the lecture platform, together with my new book, "Brain without Sex," now in course of preparation, I fear that it would be a hopeless task for me to take any further engagements.

"Do not misunderstand me. I do not wish to relegate the trivial affairs of life to mere oblivion, and I believe most thoroughly in recreation as a means of sustaining us in our life work.

"At rare intervals, when I am perhaps overcome by the arduous duties of my life work, I might descend, as I have occasionally in the past, to give an odd moment now and then to the subject of which you speak. We all have our moments of relaxation, brief as they must be in my case, and I cannot lay too much stress on the value of some light form of amusement as a means of recuperation

"In this sense I might occasionally descend to your level, and share your feelings, but it would be too much to expect this from me as a constant thing. Perhaps at some future time I might have more leisure, but I am afraid that I could never really love you in the sense that you use the term. Such a thing I have outgrown long ago."

One hour later, in the little hall room of his boarding-house, not many miles from the scene where this story opens, a young man sat with clasped hands and an expression of radiant satisfaction on his face; and then, as he mechanically turned the picture of the woman he had loved toward the wall, he murmured gratefully to himself: "What a narrow escape! Suppose I had caught her in a moment of relaxation and she had accepted me."—Harper's Bazar.
