CHAPTER III.
BY J. H. HESELTINE.

It was after ten when he drove off, and scarcely an hour had elapsed before Wilson had slipped like a ghost out of the shadow of the Abbv. from which all the lights had disappeared, to tell us that the household had retired, and to usher us in through the entrance at the back, whence we crept up silently to take our position in a dark corner close to the door of Oliver Grendall's room. We did not speak, and the hours, chimed out from the clock over the stables, seemed each a complete night.

At last, just after two o'clock chimed, I felt Wilson start, and rousing myself from a sort of waking dream into which my thoughts had sunk, I glanced in the direction of Oliver Grendall's room and saw that a faint chink of light had appeared suddenly. Listening intently, we could catch the sound of somebody moving inside the room. I waited breathlessly. I wanted to warn Wilson not to breathe so loudly, but dared not even whisper. If the hours had seemed like nights the minutes which could only have elapsed before Oliver Grendall opened the door seemed like hours to us. He came out, carrying a candle, and wearing a dressing gown, which hung loosely round his gaunt figure. There was something ghoully in the sight and in the thought of what he was contemplating, that made my blood run cold, as he passed us so close that the light of his candle almost fell upon us. If he noticed us everything would be lost; but, although he glanced round him suspiciously and stood for one terrible moment staring right into the darkness which covered us, he did not appear to suspect anything, and passed on slowly and silently in the direction of Decima's room.

It was some moments before we dared take the least movement to follow, guided by the glimmer of his candle, and when he entered the room, and shut the door behind him, Wilson and I both hung back. It was Sir Tem who turned the knob so carefully that it made no sign, and we followed him stealthily.

Oliver Grendall was too engaged to notice us even if there had been light enough. At the far side of the room, he was bending down to pass his hand carefully over one of the carved panels of the wainscoting.

It was all I could do to restrain an exclamation when the panel sprang back, revealing a black cavity behind, into which the gaunt figure in the dressing gown was inserting his arm. He must have unfastened some latch there, for the next moment he had swung open a door formed of several of the panels, the presence of which no one could possibly have suspected from the appearance of the wainscoting. The next moment he had disappeared through it with his candle, leaving us in total darkness, except for one glimmer of light from the secret door.
