He says the condition of the miners and their families has been grossly misrepresented to the public and that they are not at all the down-trodden, poverty-stricken class they have been represented by many writers. He claims for them that they are among the best paid workingmen in the world; that they have good homes and educated families. On the other hand, Mr. Knight does not spare the operator. He brands as false the statement of the operator that he cannot pay a higher price for labor with out working his mine at a loss "The fact of the matter is" says Mr. Knight, "that the combined profits of the anthracite operator for the past year represented sixteen percent on the stock of the companies, while private mineowners, who work at greater disadvantage in the matter of treightrates, in no case that I have been able to discover, made less than fifteen per cent on the investment " "But," continued Mr. Knight. 'from a socialog cal standpoint, the worst feature of this colossal conflict has been the general dissatisfaction and destruction of confidence that it created. It is perceptible in the miner's home. It is seen in the faces of himself and his family. Thrift, economy, the education of the children, the payment on the homes, all seem to be forgotton, swallowed up in the memory of his grievances. As one walks the streets of Shenandonh, a general air of sulled depression prevades the place. Neighbors of years refuse to speak as they pass; inkept children lotter in the alleys when they should be in school, and even the house of God is not free from the curse that has fallen over the land."
