Editor's Note

Grant County may not have a large population, but the big-hearted people who live here have shown time and again that they can accomplish great things when they work together.

One of the most important ways people focus their energies to get things done is by giving their time and resources to one of the county's many nonprofit organizations.

You hold in your hands the seventh edition of Grant County Giving Back, a special section of the Blue Mountain Eagle that provides a forum for these nonprofits, and the businesses that support them, to educate area residents about what they do – and what they need to do an even better job of serving the community.

Each year we've expanded our list of local nonprofits, and we aim to keep going until the list is complete. By including every charitable organization in the county, we hope to shine a light on all the many ways Grant County residents pitch in to help make this community a better place for everyone.

We also hope this section will inspire you to give of your own time and resources (if you're not doing so already). Take a look at the list of Grant County nonprofits in this section. We can just about guarantee you'll find at least one that speaks to your own interests and values.

Finally, we'd like to express our heartfelt appreciation to all the tireless volunteers and generous businesses who give so much to support these charitable organizations.

These are the ties that bind a community together and make it feel like home.
