Transportation: Warrenton differs from other cities

cluding Main Avenue, Pacific Drive, Harbor Drive, Highway 104 and Highway 101.

The state requires cities to have a transportation plan in place that serves as a long-term guide or blueprint for future transportation investments. In Warrenton's case, the plan would provide guidance through 2035.

The state's plans need to mesh with the city's, Shonkwiler said.

Normally, devising a plan takes about two years, said Angela Rogge, a traffic engineer with David Evans & Associates, a consultant working on Warrenton's plan. The process is taking a bit more time because there have been many changes recently.

"The project kicked off in 2015, when the traffic count was collected," Rogge said. "ODOT did the data collection and we're tasked with taking that data and interpreting it to meet the peak season as well as during times of normal traffic."

Walmart, other commercial projects, the recently approved Fort Pointe project along Ridge Road and other developments proposed or in the works have required adjustments in the data.

Warrenton has issues that set it apart from other communities: tourism traffic in the summer, state ownership of the city's main streets and ensuring sensitivity to wetlands and historical resources, project leaders said.

Residents who didn't attend the open house can comment online about various components.

Cost for the Transportation System Plan update is about $200,000, Shonkwiler said.
