

Maritime: Good news for program

Should the two-year college be named a Domestic Maritime Center of Excellence, it will be able to admit more students, expand training facilities, hire more faculty and create new maritime career paths. The act also allows the college to award credit for prior learning experiences, including military service.

"This is huge for us," said Bill Antilla, Maritime Technology instructor at the college. "There are a handful of colleges that could qualify for this and we are one of them."

College President Chris Breitmeyer pointed out that Clatsop's position on the Pacific Ocean at the mouth of the Columbia River should give the college a high chance of winning the designation.

"We are honored and greatly appreciative that Congress is recognizing community colleges as training sources for mariners and marine technology workers," Breitmeyer said. "(We) welcome the opportunity to produce highly qualified workers to enter the maritime workforce and alleviate the shortages that are occurring due to retirements and the expanding global market."

The next step is for the U.S. Maritime Administration to determine the criteria for qualifying colleges.

"Not only does this open doors for resources and direct funding, it recognizes the maritime industry as a valuable occupation," Antilla said. "People don't always recognize what a lucrative opportunity the maritime industry can be. We need serious students in these programs to fill the demand of these good-paying jobs."

Besides additional funds, the Maritime Administration would provide support, technical assistance and even surplus federal assets like marine vessels to community and technical colleges to use in their training programs.

Industry leaders have noticed a shortage of qualified maritime workers. The maritime industry requires technical skills training and licensing -- even for entry-level positions.

To earn credentials for each level of employment, maritime workers must complete regular training, which can be provided by community and technical colleges at an affordable cost.

Today, students here at the Marine and Environmental Research and Training Station, or MERTS, can get certified in seamanship, vessel operations and other specialized training.
