Student athletes will have new rules next year

The Columbia Press

Warrenton High School will change athlete regulations in the fall, imposing a policy designed to be more helpful for students with drug, alcohol and other behavioral problems.

"We were, A, letting kids get away with a lot and, B, when kids did get into trouble, we weren't helping them enough," Athletic Director Robert Hoepfl told the school board Wednesday night.

The high school's current policy punishes a student by kicking him or her off the team with no second chance.

"What we noticed, almost uniformly, is when they're removed from a team, it definitely had a negative impact on their grades," Hoepfl said. A student might simply fall further into the bad behavior, spending his or her newfound free time with the wrong crowd.

Another problem with the old policy is that the consequence for bad behavior only applied to the athlete's current sport season.

A football player who goes on a drinking binge the last week of the season would be kicked off the team, but could then jump right onto a winter sport that started a week or two later. The new policy wouldn't allow that.

An infraction will cause a student to miss 20 percent of their current sports season. If the season has less than 20 percent of games remaining, the suspension will carry over to the next sport.

For a student to return to play, they must take a drug and alcohol assessment with a health care provider and write an apology letter to their team and coach.

A second infraction will cause them to miss 50 percent of an athletic season and additional remediation is required.

A third infraction suspends them from sports for 365 days.

A fourth infraction results in no more athletics.
