Oregon is king when it comes to Christmas trees

BY BRIAN ROONEY
Oregon Employment Dept.

Oregon is the No. 1 Christmas tree producing state in the nation, according to data from the Pacific Northwest Christmas Tree Association.

Roughly $90 million in wholesale sales and 5.2 million trees were harvested in 2016. Most of the trees were noble fir at 54 percent and Douglas fir at 32 percent. This year, the U.S. Capitol Christmas tree, an 82-foot noble, came from Oregon's Willamette National Forest.

About 92 percent of Northwest Christmas trees were exported with 45 percent headed to California and 16 percent headed to Mexico. The balance were sent to other U.S. regions.

A lot goes into getting Oregon Christmas trees to market as fresh and green as possible. It starts with wholesale sales, then a tight harvest window, and then transportation to market. However, counting employment in Oregon's Christmas tree industry is difficult since production and selling are included in several broad industries with other commodities.

Christmas tree growing likely creates the most jobs in the industry, especially during the harvest, which occurs just before the holidays. Since Christmas tree growers are required to have a license from the Oregon Department of Agriculture, it provides a rough idea of the magnitude of the industry. There are 382 licensed Christmas tree growers in Oregon cultivating 42,000 acres.

In 2017, employment grew into spring and summer and spiked with the harvest in November at roughly 1,300 workers. Annual average employment was 469 and annual average pay was $32,969.
