Mark Schneider, who spit out his berry after biting into a sample.

"I like sour things, but it was way too sour," added Jeremiah Ayers.

Jackson Baker liked the berries and swallowed his.

"I think they're very sour," Shelby Brown said. "I like the juice, though, and other things made of cranberries. I think this trip is exciting and fun."

Dan Bogh grew up working on his parents' cranberry farm and his mom, Jean, still has a four-acre farm across the street. The couple bought their large boggy property five years ago.

"It's a hard life, especially since the price of cranberries is down now," Trinda Bogh said.

"But we've loved it," Jean Bogh said.

The Bogh farm, and four others in the area, belong to the Ocean Spray farmer-owned cooperative.

The 90 students who visited this week got to see what cranberry bogs look like, watch cranberries being harvested and got to sample the unprocessed fruit.

Trinda Bogh told the students to remember the berries that made their glass of Ocean Spray cranberry juice may have had their start in Warrenton.

Cranberries are harvested from September to November.
