WFD: Chief reports on first year at helm

procedures developed for the city by Lexipol, a company that ensures police and fire agencies keep up with new safety rules and practices developed nationwide.

For the first time in years, the department has reconnected with CERT, the Community Emergency Response Team, a group of trained volunteers who step in to help first responders during major emergencies.

"I feel like we've done a pretty good job bettering our public image," Alsbury said.

Firefighters competed 3,673 hours of training in 2020, with an average of 175 hours each. Department of Public Safety Standards and Training requires firefighters to undergo at least 60 hours of training per year.

Other changes in the department include a revision to the command structure. Four volunteers were promoted to lieutenant and two paid staff members were named division chiefs, giving Alsbury more time to focus on administration.

The agency applied for and received a $20,000 Oregon Department of Forestry grant to purchase protective gear to fight wildland fires.

And, at the end of the year, the Warrenton Volunteer Firefighters Association collected and provided food for 81 families at Christmas and raised $5,000 cash to fund future Christmas basket efforts.

In his written report, Alsbury summed up: "I would like to thank everyone for this opportunity of a lifetime, a dream I have had since my father was a fire chief. That dream: to have a department of my own, to lead and guide through the good times and bad times, to make changes for the better and (to) help build or inspire others to do more for their community."

Commissioners praised Alsbury at the completion of his first year.

"Morale has improved," Mayor Henry Balensifer said. "I applaud everything you've done."

Rick Newton added: "What you've done is miraculous, far and above what was expected."
