Staffing: City works to fill spots

wrote. "I suppose it depends on how much the tech can do. I really feel the priority should be on day-to-day planning issues that I believe a para-professional planning tech can accomplish. Obviously more complex projects will need to be dealt with by a professional planner."

Warrenton has had trouble keeping a permanent planning director.

There have been six planning directors or interim directors during the past five years.

The most recent director, Scott Hazelton, announced his resignation after five months because he couldn't find a place to live. Scott Hess, the director before Hazelton, stayed with the city just six months before leaving.

Hazelton had continued helping Warrenton with some projects after he returned to the Midwest. But he was hired last month as planning director for the city of Muskogee, Okla., so he has no more spare time.
