LOVE A DISEASE.

The Tender Passion Rewarded by Science as a Malady.

When a Man Falls in Love He Is in a State of Physical Disturbance, According to a Learned Physician.

Science is making itself obnoxious. As if it were not enough to discover to a germ-fearing world that there are microbes in kisses, it now declares that love is itself a disease. It adds, moreover, that the lover, when all mankind is almost as unwell and out of health, in body and mind, as a person with paresis. Love may be caught, like measles or pneumonia, by exposure to certain influences when the system is generally weak. With all the medical jargon about a simple statement, science describes love as a fever, a self-recognized symptom and often mortal results, and may be treated from the materia medica like any other illness.

This discovery means earnestly to many individual human hopes. Man is not often in a condition to fall in love; he is too healthy during the greater part of his life. So, instead of expecting that any male person who comes her way will be struck with desire for her, a girl hereafter will know that only men who happen to see her first when they are in a rare, peculiar state are likely to take the fever. How much that reduces a girl's chances of marriage may be imagined when, under the same conditions, a very man was possible husband, a girl could not count on more than one chance in 3,000.
