

Col. Brodie's Two Wounds

How tough Brodie's story of two terrible wounds in the Civil War.

"It was a strange coincidence," said Col. Brodie, the second in command of the famous four riders, the other day, as he with a few of the scattered band of famous fighters were waiting for a train to Williams. "It's a strange coincidence that I was wounded when I was a lieutenant, just fresh from West Point, on the 24th day of June, by Apaches out here, and it was the 24th day of June, over 30 years later, I was wounded at Los Guaymas, in Cuba, and nearly in the same place."

"I was nothing but a kid then, and was stationed at Fort Grant. A short time after the outbreak in '73, built up the place, and was helping to keep the red crosses in shape there with a few men, and a few supplies. It was over 100 miles and through the Indian country all the way, hills and desert where a pack-trail would have trouble to keep on a trail. About half way out, eight of my troopers deserted. There was no use in my trying to get them back again, for you could find them in the first place, and get them back again, and I couldn't have taken them back with me if I had found them, because I didn't have enough men to do it."

"We had been dogging hostile bands of Indians for some time before we had a brush with them. Coming up through a long draw we jumped up a band of about 15 or 20 and the music commenced. There was no way of getting in any fancy moves on them—we were in the bottom of a long draw, or canyon, just about wide enough for an ordinary road. It was a rather good retreat, and I climbed a side of the canyon. There wasn't much to be made over; we would have had a long retreat down that draw and been potted if we attempted to climb the sides of the canyon. My sergeant was an old-timer, as were a number of my little band. They knew as well as I did that the only thing that would save us was a quick dash right into them—something that the Indian can't stand a little bit unless they outnumber you to one. We gave them a volley to stir them up, and let them know we were coming, and had the satisfaction of seeing three or four of them drop, then, yelling like a lot of hyenas, we started down the draw on a dead run, headed straight into them. Each trooper swung out his six-shooter ready for a snap-shot at the first Indian he could reach. The old sergeant was close at my side with eyes full of hugging down close to the saddle. I turned half around in my saddle just before we struck them, and as I did so a bullet broke through my saddle horn and another cut through my vest and ripped me across the stomach about a half-inch deep.

"The Apaches couldn't stand the rush. We run them up the canyon about a mile before they could find any side breaks to get out of and scatter. We lost three troopers in the fight. After it was over we went back to where they were, rolled them in their blankets and buried them among the rocks as best we could. There wasn't much money or tears for the poor fellows—we hadn't time for it; we all expected the same thing all the time; besides there was a splendid possibility of the whole bunch of us going the same way before we got through, without anyone left to roll us in a blanket. If the poor Indian gathered in a band of blue-coats, he also gathered up their hair, and left a flock of buzzards to do the rest.

"After burying the troopers we struck a trail up the canyon side and camped in a clearing where we could command a view of the country surrounding, and doctored up our wounds as best we could; mine was painful, but only a flesh wound. I think I was sorer over my ruined new coat and vest than of the wound.

"The band of Indians circled around our camp again that afternoon, and we exchanged long shots with them, without doing any damage to either side. As soon as night came we struck out for Fort Grant as fast as we could make it through the night, and eluded them. An Indian won't fight at night, anyway, unless you force him to.

"We reached the fort late the next day. The closer we came to it the less danger there was, for troops from the fort kept the country round pretty well cleaned up and quiet.

"We stayed at the fort for several days, until our wounds healed, before making a return trip. The colonel in command of the fort insisted on my staying there for a time, as there were over 300 hostile Indians on the warpath scattered all over that country. He told me that it was foolish to see me attempt again, but I was young, and had told the captain I'd be back as soon as I could make the trip with the mail and supplies, and wouldn't stay.

"I didn't know it at the time, but learned afterward, that the Indians had the running fight with coming over belonged to a sub-chief and a relative of old Gerónimo, but I found it out coming back. We hadn't been two days when they sighted us; luckily, it happened just about sundown. They

Trade of United States with Canada Shows Big Increase.

This Despite the Fact of the Preferential Tariff Rates Established Between Canada and Great Britain—A Year's Record.

The Canadian preferential tariff in favor of the United Kingdom has not had the expected effect of reducing the proportion which the United States supplies of manufactures imported into Canada and territory.
