Fragment of Southern Oregon History Regarding the Indian Troubles of the Fifties.

Following closely upon the hardship a of that bleak winter of 1853 came the outbreaks of the Indians. During the summer of '54 Louis Galice, a white miner, was murdered by the redskins and war was at once declared. The Indians were not altogether to blame, as many of them were wantonly killed by the whites. The copper-skinned savages court at Tacoma, Wash, decided in scon acquired the love of gold, as they favor of the Northern Pacific railroad scon acquired the love of gold, as they were not slow to learn that they could exchange the metal for guns, pistols and ammunition. Can the Oregonian give Sells sight drafts on New York, San Fran-isco, and Portland, who know the country, it seems apparent that the only object would be to enable speculators to acquire scrip through the settlers. The reserve as proposed would cover the largest part of the mineral zone of Southern Oregon and retard the development of the mining resources very seriously. The southern part of it would cover the timber belt from which this country must draw its supply of umber, but the northern part compris in the main a timberless range, valuable only for its mines. The Oregonian can perform no greater service for this vicinity than opposing this scheme. ROBERT G. SMITH.

It does not yet appear who is at the ottom of the project for a large new forest reserve in Southern Oregon. It is certain that Commissioner Hermann favored a reserve there and a report by Secretary Hitchcock to the House of Representatives last year named the generous boundaries indicated in the Oregonian. People living in the vicinity of the proposed reserve ought to be able to give the origin of this move.
