The crew of the English steamer Baroda, which ran ashore a few miles south of the Corvillie river in Oregon, were passengers on board the steamer Mandalay for San Francisco. We are informed by some of them that the steamer is lying head-on to the sea, high and dry, so that one can walk around it at low tide. The ship is of steel and draws 12 feet of water in ballast. At high tide the water is only 11 feet deep around her, consequently she lacks one foot of floating. No hope of saving the vessel is entertained by the crew.—Crescent City News.
