MRS. OSCAR REID had been for some time in the hands of the sophists. She belonged to a North end club called "Sons and Daughters of Progress." Its watchword was "The Subordination of the Individual to the Good of the Whole." From this point of view it discussed the leading basics of the day, and arrived at some remark able conclusions. It held, for instance, that the claims of youth were in every way paramount to those of advances inasmuch as childhood held un told possibilities of rich fruitage yet in bud, while old age was but a ripene and emptied seed pod, and even middle life had in most cases past the zenith of fruition. Some of the most progressive members even went so far as to aver that when public sentiment had been sufficiently educated to overcome sentimental prejudice regarding the value of human life, it might be possible and wise to dispose of the senile or hopelessly discussed in as suppracy "He does already—he suggested it or hopelessly diseased in as summary a way as we treat the emptied pod or the blighted plant.

Mrs. Reid joined the club as the wife of a well-to-do stock broker who had come west for "a slight throat trou-ble." The same winter a tumble in stocks and an attack of la grippe had left him a penalless invalid. They removed to a two-roomed house in the South end and Mrs. Reid took in fine sewing and embroidery. A few months after this change their daughter Alberta was born. A week previous to her birth a wealthy customer came to consult about an infant's wardrobe.

"I will do what I can for you, but can promise nothing ahead. I-" Her lip quivered and a sudden patter followed the thought of what she must soon face and the slender sum laid by for the emergency. Her customer was politely sympathetic.

"I am sorry," she said; "I would like everything done by your hand; your

He spoke not of love, That evening, when her husband was asleep, Mrs. Reid took out the dainty only of respect and duty-far higher than love of sacrifice, the highest little clothes which she had fashioned before adversity overwhelmes her. They were fine enough for the child of a millionaire. After kissing each tiny form of love. The next morning human souls to their utmos, espacity, and he could think of no worthier subjects than herself and the beautishe telephoned the wealthy customer, who came and examined the wardrobe ful Alberta. And ail could be easily arranged. They could go quietly away critically and took it away in her car--a good sanitarium selected-a life term paid in advance. The divorce ringe. After Mrs. Reid had bought a cheap, ready-made outfit there was enough money left to double the emer-gency fund. But she cried a good deal tions asked. The husband and father must be happy in the thought of his nights, which was bad for Alberta sublime sacrifice his years could be

For Alberta was not only a delicate. sensitive child, but very early devel-oped a craving for things dainty and fine, which her mother could not sup-ply. Imbued with the club theories of the supremacy of childhood, Mrs. Reld began to grow bitter over Alberta's defrauded childhood. Her husband's cough began to exasperate her in stead of arousing her sympathy. Every dollar she spent for medicine seemed stolen from Alberta. She found herself vaguely wondering how long a con-sumptive could live. Of course there were times when these feelings shocked and pained her, and she would then redouble her devotion to her husband and try to forget club theories.

Sometimes she almost wished she had withdrawn from the club when their change of fortune came, but it seemed the one link with her happy past, and she could not let it go Her husband shared or tried to share the remarkable beliefs of the Sons and Daughters of Progress. "Do you know, dear," he said, as she was dressing for the club one evening, "that you would be quite justified in suing for divorce?" Mrs. Reid started. Divorce was the subject for discussion that night. "Yes," he continued, "as the laws are now, you could get one easily enough-nonsupport, you know-and unhampered by me you could give Alberta the privileges which should be her birthright. I have though I have thought often that I ought-to take-myself away-but I am too cowardly-I'm too sick to be brave-and I-I love you and Alberta so-"

"But not well enough to die for us -hark! there is my car. Be sure Alberta keeps covered, but den't sit up for me. Good-by!"

Mrs. Reid's words were lightly spoken. She meant them as a jest, out they entered her husband's soul like a red-hot iron.

At the club they took the same divorce suggested by Mr. Reid. If for any cause a man failed to support and properly educate 1 children and the mother could do this better alone, she was amply justified in severing the marriage tie. In fact, it was her plain duty to do so. "But if the husband was sick and
