when the greese go flying northward where the lakes, kinsed by the sun.
Laugh in glad anticipation, oh, for freedom and a gun!
Oh, to fing away smbition and go journeying air
Prom the forges and the markets where the weary people are.
To go stumbiling through the briars and across the fills again.
Caring nothing for the future or the things that worry men.

There is something sweet and luring in the mellow breeze that blows
Down among the old gray stubbles where they stand in slanting rows:
There is something in the murmur of the stream that hurries on Through the rankes like the whisper of a spirit that is gone—
Like a whispered invitation to go roaming free and far.
When the grees go flying northward where the sky-blue waters are.

VOLTAIRE having gone lame at the hurdles the day before, his master was taking a morning walk instead of a ride, when he met Mias Hearst in an auto. He raised his hat and evinced a disposition to stop, whereupon the lady gave the steering gear such a vigorous twist that the machine seemed determined to chase Eskridge off the sidewalk and over the fence. "Stop me!" she called, but before he could move she had accomplished the feat herself with a suddenness that nearly sent her over the dashboard and into his ready arms.

"The thing seems tender mouthed,' said he. "You're too hard on the bit." "It's my first trip alone," she explained, turning the auto in a jerky, hesitating way, as the power was nervously applied or shut off, until she drew up beside the curb in ortho-dox fashion. "Great fun, though, this -this-"

"Motoring," suggested Eskridge, tentatively.

"Motoring!" Helen's glance was pitying, though her accent hinted at scorn. "Boes it look like a street car? scorn. "Does it look like a street car? To mobe is now the correct form, so Mr. Crandall says."

"I suppose he has put you on to this new electric fad," said Eakridge, cyc-ing the spick and span automobile as if it were a personal enemy. "Put me on!" Helen's glance as well as tone were harmoniously contemptuous now. "How slangy you grow. Then in assumed surprise: "You seem to be walking. Where is Voltaire?"

"Where I suppose Rosamond is, in the paddock." Rosamond was Miss Hearst's favorite riding pony. "While you and Crandall 'mobe' in your horseleas, I suppose I may be allowed to more on foot."

Helen looked up and down the avenue, at the vacant seat by her, then at the gloomy young man on the sidewalk

"Mr. Crandall is in the city," she responded, demurely enough. "He may be 'motoring' there for what I know-George!"
