It will probably yet take some years of experience and the destruction of much valuable timber to convince the legislators of the entire error of the present system, which is based on the theory of keeping all fire out of the timber forever, an absurd impossibility. The longer fire is kept out of the woods the more destructive the fire when it does come, as it certainly will in time. The only way to protect the forests is by frequent barnings, the fires of which will not develop heat enough to injure the larger growths. This idea prevails among experienced woodsmen, but not among those who control legislation. The probable amendments to the fire laws now in force, will be to make them more stringent and to exact a heavier penalty for their vio-
