On reaching maturity, they like the stem-mothers give birth to another generatiion of agamic females, the individuals of which as they approach maturity, de velop wings and migrate to the hop. This migration occurs about June 1st in the Rogue River Valley or possibly during the last half of May and after it is over, if all the lice in a yard could be destroyed, there could be no further infection during the remain der of the season. After once reaching the hop generation after generation of wingless agamic females are produced until about the time the crop is being gathered when a generation of winged agamic females is developed and migrates back to the plum where birth is given to sexual, wingless females. A generation of winged males is then developed upon the hop. These fly to the plum, mate with the females each of which then deposits upon the plum twigs two or three small oval eggs, which are at first green but later become shining block.
