said Beverly as sae sailled forth for her walk in the park.

In the afternoon she went driving with Princess Yetive and the young Duke of Mizrox, upon whose innocent and sufficiently troubled head she was beaping secret abuse because of the news be brought. Later Count Marlanx appeared at the castle for his first she was eager to learn how matters stood with Baldos. The count's threat ridiculous shadow of mercy. She knew account for his temerity sooner or not the real power behind the Iron later. It was like the cat and the help- | Count?

"But, your highness," complained the count, "war may break out any day. I cannot concede delay."

"I think there's a game called 'shooting craps," suggested she serenely. "It seems to me it would be particularly good for warriors. You could be shooting something all the time."

He went away in a decidedly iraselble frame of mind. She did not know it, but Baidos was soon afterward set to work in the garrison stables, a most lonthsome occupation, in addition to his duties as a guard by night

After mature deliberation Beverly set herself to the task of writing home to her father. It was her supreme intention to convince him that she would be off for the States in an amazingly short time. The major upon receiving the letter three weeks later found noth ing in it to warrant the belief that she was ever coming home. He did observe, however, that she had but little use for the army of Granstark and was especially disappointed in the set of men Yetive retained as her private guard. For the life of her Beverly could not have told why she disapproved of the guard in general or in particular, but she was conscious of the fact after the letter was posted that she had said many things that might have been left unwritten. Besides, it was not Baldos' fault that she could not sleep. It was distinctly her own. He had nothing to do with

"I'll bet father will be glad to hear that I am coming home," she said to Yetive after the letter was gone. "Oh, Beverly, dear, I hate to hear of your going," cried the princess. "When did you tell him you'd start?"

"Why-oh-er-let me see, when did I say? Dash me, as Mr. Anguish would say, I don't believe I gave a date. It seems to me I said soon; that's all."

"You don't know how relieved I am," exclaimed Yetive rapturously, and Bererly was in high dudgeon because of the implied reflection. "I believe you are in a tiff with Baldos," went on Yetive airily.

"Goodness! How foolish you can be at times, Yetive!" was what Beverly gave back to her highness the Princess of Graustark.

Late in the evening couriers came in from the Dawsbergen frontier with reports which created considerable excitement in castle and army circles. Prince Gabriel himself had been seen in the northern part of his domain, accompanied by a large detachment of the belief that something worth while was about to occur. General Marlanx issued orders for the Edelweiss army corps to mass beyond the southern gates of the city the next morning. Commands were also sent to the outlying garrisons. There was to be a general movement of troops before the end of the week. Graustark was not to be caught napping.

Long after the departure of Lorry and Anguish the princess sat on the balcony with Beverly and the Countess Dagmar. They did not talk much. The mission of these venturesome young American husbands was full of danger. Something in the air had told their wives that the first blows of war were to be struck before they looked again upon the men they loved.

"I think we have been betrayed by some one," said Dagmar after an almost interminable silence. Her comdld not reply. "The couriers say that Gabriel knows where we are weakest at the front and that he knows our every movement. Yetive, there is a spy here after all."

'And that spy has access to the very heart of our deliberations," added Beverly pointedly. "I say this in behalf of the man whom you evidently suspect, countess. He could not know these things."

"I do not say that he does know, Miss Calhoun, but it is not beyond reason that he may be the go-between, the means of transferring information from the main traitor to the messengers who await outside our walls."

"Oh, I don't believe it!" cried Beverly hotly.

"I wonder if these things would have happened if Baldos had never come to Edelweiss," mused the princess. As though by common impulse, both of the Granstark women placed their arms about Beverly.

"It's because we have so much at stake, Beverly, dear," whispered Dag-"Forgive me if I have hurt mar. you."

Of course Beverly sobbed a little in the effort to convince them that she did not care whom they accused if he proved to be the right man in the end. They left her alone on the balcony. For an hour after midnight she sat there and dreamed. Every one was ready to turn against Baldos. Even she had been harsh toward him, for had she not seen him relegated to the most obnoxious of duties after promising him a far different life? And now what was be thinking of her? His descent from favor had followed upon the disclosures which made plain to each the identity of the other. No lesson in poker. He looked so sure of doubt he was attributing his degradabimself that Beverly hated him to the tion in a sense to the fact that she no Point of desperation. She wondered if he were patrolling the castle grounds in the rain in all that lonely darkness. Seized by a sudden inspiration she threw a gossamer about her, grasped an umbrella and ventured out upon the baleony once more. Guiltily she searched the night through the fine, drizzling rain. Her ears listened eagerly for the trend which was so well known to

At last he strode beneath a lamp not far away. He looked up, but of course could not see her against the dark wall. For a long time he stood motionless beneath the light. She could not help seeing that he was dejected, tired, unhappy. His shoulders drooped, and there was a general air of listlessness about the figure which had once been so full of courage and of hope. The post light fell directly upon his face. It was somber, despondent, strained. He wore the air of a prisoner. Her heart went out to him like a flash. The debonair knight of the black patch was no more. In his place there stood a sullen slave to discipline.

"Baldos!" she called softly, her voice senetrating the dripping air with the enrices of a bell. "You must not!" she cried desperate "This is madness! Go down, sir!"

"I am happy enough to fly, but cannot. So I do the next best thing-I climb to you." His arm was across the stone railing by this time, and he was panting from the exertion, not two feet from where she crouched. "Just one minute of heaven before I go back to the shadows of earth. I am happy again. Marianx told me you had dis missed me. I wonder what he holds in reserve for me. I knew he fied, but it is not until now that I rejoice. Come, you are to shield me from the rain."

"Oh. oh!" she gasped, overwhelmed by his daring passion. "I should die if any one saw you here." Yet she spasmodically extended the umbrella so that it covered him and left her out in the drizzle.

"And so should I," responded be softly, "Listen to me. For hours and hours I have been longing for the dear old hills in which you found me. wanted to crawl out of Edelweiss and lose myself forever in the rocks and crags. Tonight when you saw me I was trying to say goodby to you forever. I was trying to make up my mind to desert. I could not endure the new order of things. You had cast me off. My friends out there were eager to have me with them. In the city every one is ready to call me a spy-even you, I thought. Life was black and drear. Now, my princess, it is as bright as heaven itself."

You must not talk like this," she whispered helplessly. "You are making me sorry I called to you."

"I should have heard you if you had only whispered, my rain princess. I have no right to talk of love-I am a vagabond, but I have a heart, and it is a bold one. Perhaps I dream that I am here beside you-so near that I can touch your face-but it is the sweetest of dreams. But for it I should have left Edelweiss weeks ago. I shall never awaken from this dream. You cannot rob me of the joys of dreaming."

Under the spell of his passion she drew nearer to him as he clung strong-

DOCTORS MISTAKES

Are said often to be buried six feet under ground. But many times women call on their family physicians, suffering, as they imagine, one from dyspepsia, another from heart disease, another from liver or kidney disease, another from nervous pros-tration, another with pain here and there, ney disease, another from here and there, and in this way they present alike to themselves and their easy-going or overbusy doctor, separate diseases, for which he, assuming them to be such, prescribents; pills and potions. In reality, they are all only symptoms caused by some uterine disease. The physician, anorant of the cruse of suffering, keeps up his treatment until large bills are mide. The suffering patient gets no better to reason of the wrong treatment, but probably worse. A proper medicine like Dr. Pierce's Fayorite Prescription, directed to the couse would have entirely removed the disease, thereby dispelling all those distressing symptoms, and instituting comfort instead of prolonged misery. It has been well said, that "a disease known is half cured."

Dr. Pierce's Fayorite Prescription is a scientific medicine, carefully devised by an experienced and skillful physician, and adapted to woman's delicate system. It is made of native American modicinal roots and is perfectly harmless in its effects in any condition of the length shields.
