on't want that." "It's more than likely I'll be arrest d sooner or later, anyhow," he said. with a suggestion of weariness, as if this were a matter it was a waste of time to consider. "The Lord has set is face against me. It's his wish I hould return. I've been stubborn and headstrong and wouldn't see it, but look there." And he nodded toward the red western sky. "It's a summons. I got to obey whether I want to or not."

"It won't be safe. No telling what they will do with you."

"That ain't the question, Dannie; that ain't at all the question. It's not what they'll do to me." And he softly patted the hand that rested on Dan saw that his clothes hung loose ly to his mighty frame. They were torn and stained. He had the appearence of a man who had endured hardship, privation and toil. His glance was fugitive and anxious. have you been all this while?" he ask ed. "Not here?"

"No; I have been living in the woods, trying to escape from the country, and the fires wouldn't let me. Wherever I went they were there ahead of me, driving me back."
Why did you kill him? How did it happen?" Dan added. "Or is it all a mistake? Did you do it?"

The smile faded from the old convict's lips,

"It was a sort of accident, and it was sort of carelessness, Dannie," he explained, with a touch of sullenness. "I hit him-not hard, mind you. I know I shouldn't have done it, but he was in the wrong, and he wouldn't listen to reason. I don't know when I ever seen a man so set in his wickdness.' "And now you want to go back. Do you know what it means if you are arrested? Have you thought of that?" Roger Oakley waved the query aside as though it concerned him not at all. "I want to be with you," he said wistfully. "You may not get through alive, and I want to be with you. You'll need me. There's no one you can trust as you can me, for I won't fail you no matter what the danger is. And there's the girl, Dannie. Have you thought of her?"

Dan set his lips. "My God, I can't hink of anything else."

There was a moment's silence. "Here," said Dan, thrusting his ands into his pockets. "I am going to ive you what money I have. It isn't much.'

"What for, Dannie?"

"You are sure to be seen and recogsed if you stay about here. Your de ription has been telegraphed all over the state. For that reason I'll take you with me part way. Then I'll slow up. nd you can hide again. It's your only hance. I am sorry I can't do more for n arrange to meet afterward."
