away without your seeing him; you are not deceiving me?"

"Why, of course, Constance, but he'll come back." "No, he won't, papa," shaking her head sadly. "He's gone, and he will never come back. I know him better than you do." And then she fled promptly upstal to her own room.

This was the nearest Constance came to betraying her love for Oakley. She was not much given to confidences, and the ideals that had sustained her in her pride now seemed so childish and unworthy that she had no wish to dwell upon them, but whenever Dan's name was mentioned in her presence she looked frightened and guilty and avoided meeting her father's glance.

It seemed, indeed, that Oakley had taken final leave of Antioch. A new manager appeared and took formal charge of the destinies of the road. Under his direction work was resumed in the shops, for the strike had died a natural death. None of the hands was disposed to question the 10 per cent cut, and before the winter was over the scale of wages that had been in force before the strike was inaugurated was voluntarily restored. The town had no criticisms to make of Johnson, the new manager, a quiet, competent official; the most any one said was that he was not Oakley. That was enough. For Dan had come into his own,

Early in October there was a flutter of excitement when Turner Joyce and his wife left for the east to be Oakley's guests. When they returned some weeks later they had a good deal to say about him that Antioch was frankly curious to hear.

He had taken his father to Burton, where his mother was buried. Afterward he had joined General Cornish in New York.

While abroad the financier had effected a combination of interests which grouped a number of roads under one management, and Dan had been made general superintendent of the consolidated lines, with his headquarters in New York city. The Joyces were but vaguely informed as to where these fines were, but they did full justice to their magnitude, as well as to the importance of Oakley's new connection.

The dull monotony of those fall days in Antioch was never forgotten by Constance Emory. She was listless and restless by turns. She had hoped that she might hear from Oakley. She even thought the Joyces might bring her some message, but none had come. Dan had taken her at her word,

She had made no friends, and, with Ryder dead and Oakley gone, she saw no one and finally settled down into an apathy that alarmed the doctor. He, after some deliberation, suddenly announced his intention of going east to attend a medical convention. "Shall you see Mr. Oakley?" Constance asked, with quick interest. "Probably, if he's in New York when I get there.'

Constance gave him a scared look and dropped her eyes. But when the me drew near for his departure she ollowed him about as if there were comething on her mind which she wished to tell him.

The day he started she found courige to ask:

"Won't you take me with you, papa? "Not this time, dear," he answered. She was quiet for a moment and then said:

"Papa, you are not going to tell

"Tell who, Constance. What?" "Mr. Oakley." "What about Oakley, dear?"

She looked at him from under her ong lashes, while the color slowly mounted to her cheeks. "You are not going to tell him what you think you know?" The doctor smiled. "I wish you would grant me the possession of ordinary sense, Constance. I am not quite a fool."

"You are a precious," she said, kiss ing him. "Thank you. What message shall I better tell me, or I may say something shouldn't."

"Oh, you must not say anything"n alarm-"you must promise,

"Constance, what did Oakley say to you that last day he was here at the ouse?" Constance's glance wandered medi-ntively from her father's face to the window and back again, while her color came and went. There was a faraway, wistful look in her eyes and a sad little smile on her lips. At last she said softly: "Oh, he said a number of things. I can't remember now all he did say.

"Did Oakley tell you be cared for you?" Constance hesitated a moment, then, eluctantly: "Well, yes, he did. And I let him go, thinking I didn't care for him," miserably and with a pathetic droop of her lids, from which the smile had ed. "I didn't know, and I have been unhappy."

"Oh!" Constance left the room abruptly. When he reached New York the first thing the doctor did was to look up Oakley. He was quick to notice a ertain constraint in the young man's ed it to Mrs. Emory be said: manner as they shook hands, but this
