Strength of Left Hand Affected by Intellect

The relative strength of the left hand increases with decreasing intellect, Paul Popenoe, Ph. D., declares in an article on "Left-Handedness," in Hygeia, the health magazine.

Of course, this correlation between handedness and degree of mental superiority or deficiency is subject to conspicuous exceptions. But as one goes downward in the scale of intelligence, the superiority of right over the left hand, as shown by gripping tests, decreases or is even upset by a stronger left hand.

The pure right-hander is found by most tests to have the advantage; the pure left-hander comes next; the various intergrades are at the bottom of the list.

Hand and foot tend to go together, so that the hand used on the spade is an almost infallible determiner of the foot which will be used on the same implement. Hand and eye likewise tend to go together, the right-handed person usually being right-eyed as well.

It has sometimes been supposed that a bodily balance is the highest state, in which the individual uses the right hand singly but the left hand in batting or sweeping, this being supposed to produce or to be the result of, a more symmetric bodily development.

Such a situation is found most frequently among superior males—those of the highest intelligence—while the commoner situation, in which the individual bats right-handedly but sweeps left-handedly, is more usual among other males and among all normal females regardless of their level of intelligence.

Handedness is inborn and inherent, though there is still some question as to its inheritability. Handedness is correlated with other fundamental, biologic differences, such as those of sex and of intellect.

Handedness is also associated with the hair whorl on the crown of the head, an inherited characteristic which is little affected by training, as many persons can testify who happen to have one of these whorls on some other part of the scalp, which has stubbornly resisted the hairbrush during an entire lifetime. The righthander most frequently shows a clockwise whorl, while that of the lefthander is more likely to turn in a counter clockwise direction.

Tanning of Leather Was Known to the Ancients

Primitive man was content to wear fur skins. Early experimenters, however, discovered that the hair of animal hides could be removed and the skin made into smooth leather. The skin was soaked in bark juice for a week or more, then dried. Oil was rubbed into it to make it soft and pliable. The resulting material was more useful and less clumsy than a hairy skin.

Formulas for tanning were known to the ancient Arabs and Hebrews, states a writer in the Chicago Tribune. Leather was used for apparel, shoes, leggings, wine casks, money bags, and thongs. In some lands, says the historian, leather disks were used as money.

Beautifully worked leather was placed in the same category with ivory, silver or gold. In Egyptian tombs, leather has been found well preserved although more than 3,000 years old.

Warring nations covered their ships with tough leather. Soldiers carried hide protected shields or wore thick leather armor.

The Equestrian Statue

Although the belief that the position of the horse's feet in an equestrian statue signifies the fate of its rider in battle has been widely accepted, officials of the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts assert that it is without basis. This opinion held that a military equestrian statue with the horse's four feet resting on the ground indicated that the rider came through the battle safely, but that when the right foot was raised the rider had been killed in conflict and when both feet were raised the rider had been wounded. Research indicates, however, that sculptors are guided by artistic considerations rather than historical significance in this matter.

Expansion of Water

Water, like other substances, follows the general law by expanding when heated, but below the temperature of 4 deg. C. (or 32.9 deg. F.) it forms an exception to this rule. It is at its greatest density at that temperature; when cooled below that point it expands. This expansion with freezing is of great importance, for it keeps the ice on top of the heavier masses of water, thus preventing the solid freezing of lakes and ponds, which would cause the death of animal life in their waters. It also causes the bursting of water pipes in cold weather.

Seventeenth Century Pigment

During the Seventeenth century a popular pigment was made from the flowers of the common blue flag or iris. The purplish blue flowers were first allowed to ferment, then the juice was extracted and mixed with powdered alum. Later the pigment was called iris green. The flowers of the violet-colored pansy were also used to make a similar pigment.

Citizens Want Action Dredging Illinois River

Illinois Valley News, Gentlemen:

We, the citizens and farmers of the valley would appreciate very much if you would use your influence with the government toward getting the East Fork of the Illinois river channel dredged where needed. It has destroyed lots of our best farm land and is threatening to over flow again with the next high water.

Editor's Note: The only way we know anything can be done is to organize a drainage district. This will not cost anything and will put the matter up to the government in the proper way. We will assist in every way to help organize the district.

OFF IN THE CORNER WITH PHIL SNORT

This week I am asking The News to publish a letter I received from our County School Superintendent. I never received a finer letter in my life, and it is one that shall be filed away among my literary treasures. Owing to the value that this letter carries, and the beautiful thoughts it expresses—especially where it mentions the evening gatherings of the HOME FIRESIDE lang syne—I am asking The News to publish it. I have received many letters of praise, and also many of criticism, but never a finer letter nor one I thought more of.

Mr. L. R. Webb,
Cave Junction, Oregon,
Dear "Phil":
I have always read your contributions to the press with interest, and have meant to express my appreciation long before this. You have the art of being able to say very worth while things in a way and in a language that we all understand and appreciate. Your stand on the conservation of wild life is one of COMMON SENSE and real understanding.

Your articles on nature and pioneer life especially appeal to me. I am an "out-of-door-man." My father and mother were pioneers of the middle west and far west. Natural resources and wild life are the rightful heritage of this and future generations and we are derelict in our duty when we fail to fight for this heritage. I try to foster this thought in my work in the county schools.

The log cabin, the open fireside at evening time, the unbroken family circle at night fall, the family bible on the mantel shelf are not as familiar to many homes now as in a few decades past—much to the loss of our present generation.

You are doing a splendid work. Sincerely,
H. H. Wardrip.
