LUMBER FOR FARM USE OBTAINABLE UNDER NEW ORDER

Farmers will be able to obtain lumber under a new rationing program, but even farm building will be limited to construction essential to increasing food production, R. B. Taylor, chairman of the Oregon USDA War board, reported this week.

The War Production board has allocated 500 million board feet of lumber for farm use during the next four months, designed to relieve a shortage created by critical war demands that have drained the nation's lumber yards. Oregon has been given 6,700,000 board feet, which will be distributed to counties on a quota basis.

Farmers who are unable to obtain lumber under existing procedures may apply to their county war board for a purchase certificate, Taylor explained. Approved purchasers will be given a certificate bearing an AA-2 priority rating. Dealers may extend this rating to mills to replace their stocks. Lumber will be issued only for maintenance and repair of farm building and new construction essential to production. The program excludes dwellings.

War demands of wood are greatly exceeding production, Taylor said. He cited the need of the armed forces for boxing and crating material, pontoon bridges, mine sweeper timbers, wooden ships, and many other uses for lumber.

So that "we can substitute here at home instead of on the battlefield" — the war board chairman asked farmers to use substitute materials wherever possible. Fabricated building boards for inside or outside use, tile, brick, rubble masonry and concrete all can be used instead of lumber in many farm buildings, and most of these materials are available without priorities, he declared.

PRESSURE COOKERS SAFE IF OPERATED ACCORDING TO RULE

Homemakers need not fear pressure cookers if they understand a few simple rules, says Miss Lucy A. Case, extension nutritionist at Oregon State college. One rule that is commonly misunderstood is that a pressure cooker requires at least an inch of water on the bottom to prevent it from running dry and possibly cracking the cooker. Even more water than an inch does not interfere with its operation.

A second safety rule is to take the safety valve apart each day that the cooker is used and be sure that it is not stuck with grease and rust. The safety valve contains a ball and spring which are adjusted to release the pressure in case it accidentally becomes too high. Most of the explosions that one hears about were due either to a clogged safety valve or to taking the cover off the cooker before the pressure gauge registered zero — the only safe place for it to be.

Maintenance of a temperature higher than boiling is necessary for destruction of dangerous bacteria. This high temperature is attained in a pressure cooker by steam pressure, not by air pressure. Therefore, the petcock of a pressure cooker is left open when the cooker is first closed to allow air to escape.

The mixture of air and water vapor which comes from the nozzle of the petcock at first feels cool to the hand. After several minutes it feels warm and then hot. When the temperature, tested by passing the hand through the jet of steam, three or four inches from the nozzle, feels hot, it is time to close the petcock. Care is necessary that enough time is allowed to rid the cooker of air in order that a sufficiently high temperature is developed.

Retaining juice in glass jars during processing is difficult, in fact, complete retention is not always possible. Keeping the pressure steady and opening the petcock gradually after the pressure gauge reaches zero at the end of processing will aid in retention of juice. Loss of juice is not a problem in tin canning.

should be removed with a cloth before inverting the lid, because allowing water to run into the pressure gauge may damage it. The pressure cooker is stored without a tight cover to prevent off-flavors. Pressure gauges are subject to inaccuracy, and it is a good plan to have them tested each year by the manufacturer or through the county extension office. More complete directions for using a pressure cooker in canning are given in Extension bulletin 596, "Home Food Preservation," free on request at county extension offices.
