recently purchased home, the Frank E. Barrett ranch. Mr. Bolinger has owned several farms near Grants Pass and disposed of them to make his home in the Illinois valley. to write administrative detail into any statute. The best that could be done, therefore, in addition to throwing certain other safeguards around the administration of the law was to provide a system of appeal through the courts from OPA rulings.

It is true that some minor groups sought the passage of amendments that would give their interests special advantage. The House was well aware of those moves, and all such amendments were killed. There were a few also who sought to wreck the functioning of the law, but these attempts were also voted down by large majorities.

What happened during the past two years of administration of the Price Control law is very similar to the type of administration that has been given other acts passed by Congress. It happened that the OPA administration was more in the public eye and has received the most attention. However, similar administrative abuses of other laws are occurring. The Wagner Labor Relations Act is a reasonable statute, but the administration of it has caused strikes, confusion, and bad relations. There are numerous other minor examples. Since the courts as presently constituted generally uphold the Administration, we are dangerously near, under this Administration, a change in the form of our Republic from a three-branch government, namely legislative, administrative and judicial, to a government of only two branches, namely administrative and legislative. Since the Congress cannot write administrative detail into law, we are placed in a very difficult, not to say impossible, situation. As I see it, the only way of reestablishing the Republic under the Constitution is to go back to the three-branch system of government.
