DON'T CASH YOUR BONDS

The new system devised by the treasury department to allow holders of U. S. War Bonds, to go to the banks and cash them immediately, has proven a very dangerous plan for the treasury department.

This plan was made so that the bonds would become more valuable to the holders, knowing that they could cash them immediately, they are as good as money in the bank. Before this plan, it took about 10 days to send them to San Francisco to get your money on the bonds, and this inconvenience the department waived so the bonds could be easily cashed.

Instead of having the effect the treasury department believed would be used, the bonds have been cashed so far ahead of their surrender value that it has become alarming to government officials.

The new plan is another reason for holding your bonds. If you do not absolutely need the money, hold your bonds. This is just as important as selling them. If they are not held, another drive must be made to sell more bonds. If you cash your bonds you are hampering the war effort. The government does not want you to cash your bonds now, except in extreme cases of emergency.

Be patriotic and hold your bonds and earn the interest they draw. Help the war effort and help yourself at the same time. The boys on the front line can't cash their bonds. We should do as much at home.

AS THE WOUNDED COME BACK HOME

An Intimate Message From Washington
By Mary Hornaday

There's something Washington wants all American women to know, but doesn't seem quite to know how to tell them.

It's about the wounded and the "neuro-psychiatrics" who are beginning to come home from the war.

The War Manpower Commission is working on a pamphlet for ex-soldiers and sailors called, "How to Go Home", but no one knows quite how to educate the wives, mothers and sweethearts on the proper way to welcome them back.

As part of its campaign to steel the American public to sights ahead, the War Department recently gave wide publicity to the landing of the hospital ship Acadia. Scores of stretchers were photographed on Jersey docks waiting for the wounded. One fellow smiled broadly as he upped his hand down to feel real American soil.

In movie theaters—at least in Washington and presumably across the country—women sighed or shuddered. Some just sat quietly. As part of the publicity, the War Department held a press conference with six Army nurses from the ship.

They had a message for American women.

"We talked a bit on the ship coming over," began Second Lieut. Gladys K. Meister.

"Some scheme should be organized and pushed through whereby women from the ages of 16 up would visit hospital yards and accustom themselves to the sight of mutilated men. They should ask for social work in any capacity, passing out games, passing around books, playing games with the men."

Lieutenant Meister's suggestion wasn't exactly practical. It would not be feasible for all the grown women in the country to traipse through the military hospitals just to become accustomed to the sight of wounded men.

What she meant was that women of the country must strive for all they are worth to achieve the emotional control that nurses get from going about their daily tasks.

"It takes only one rebuff to cause a maimed soldier to retire and not be on the scene again," she warned.

That reminded Second Lieut. Marion L. Franchere of a mother who stood right in the middle of a hospital ward where she had come to see her maimed son and exclaimed:

"What in the world am I going to do with him?"

"That boy," said the nurse, "refused to go home."

Mrs. Roosevelt has suggested that there should be in every military hospital a discharge section where families can go to meet their returning soldier and plan in the presence of Army or Red Cross personnel how to rearrange their homes and lives to meet the new situation. For some, the transition will be easy, but as Mrs. Roosevelt pointed out, a mountaineer whose family has always walked the last six miles home or a tenement family which has to climb six flights of stairs to its abode may have readjusting to do.

One way that the Army could help women in this job would be to drop the fancy term "neuro-psychiatric" which it applies to men suffering from war fatigue.

"If someone would just educate their families that these men are no different from businessmen who have suffered from severe nervous breakdown in peacetime, it would take off a stigma," one nurse commented.

Mrs. Roosevelt said she understood some businesses had become so frightened just by the term "neuro-psychiatric" that they were refusing to take men so labeled back in their old jobs.

Maj. Walter E. Barton, Army psychiatrist, added to the discussion a set of rules for receiving back a wounded man into a family.

Here they are:

1—Remember a wounded man is a normal person. Don't expect him to behave in any unusual fashion. Train your mind to think about what's left, not what has been lost.

2—Don't dramatize either the wounded man nor his wounds. Confine your conversation to other subjects unless he begins to talk about his wounds. Remember you have no common ground with his experiences on the bottlefront.

3—Don't try to gloss over his handicap. Don't tell him he looks nice when you and he are thinking he doesn't.

4—Don't show horror or sorrow at deformity either in your voice, manner, or facial expression.

5—Give him a job to do. The Veterans' Administration and the United States Employment Service will place men in jobs outside the home. Even those at home can do some kind of work and should be assigned to it as part of the day's routine.

Encourage him to carry on his social life in contact with others. The worst thing of all is to let him crawl off in a corner and feel sorry for himself.

wishes of the grateful people of Oregon.

"On this Thanksgiving day may we do homage to God. May we symbolize our patriotism by the flying of the American flag. May we rededicate ourselves to freedom, and may we resolutely resolve ourselves to the tasks ahead."

BRIDANT SELLS RANCH

E. L. Bridant, who had a 20 acre ranch north of the upper Sucker creek bridge near the new saw mill, sold his property this week to Frank Chapman from near Los Angeles, Calif.

Mr. and Mrs. Chapman will leave Friday morning for home to ship their furniture to Cave Junction. Mr. Bridant will remain in the valley if he can find the right kind of property.

In giving the elected officers for the ensuing year for the Illinois Valley Grange last week, we left out the name of Sophia Bunch, who was re-elected assistant steward.
