trol of a single administrator. A bill was introduced by Tom Jenk and a half, we have been urging that food be placed under the control of the Food Study Committee, in 1943. Later, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture introduced a similar bill which was reported favorably to the House, but it was never acted upon.

As soon as the Food Study Committee staff organization is complete, and our data is brought up to date, the committee will doubtless again urge the passage of legislation to place food under one single control.

There has been considerable debate on the Floor of the House recently on the subject of the present food situation. Apparently some badly needed food items are scarce because ceiling prices are lower than the present cost of production. Congressman Frank Barrett of Wyoming pointed out recently that prices can be held down and even rolled back, or that food production can be increased, but it will be impossible to do both. The Food Study Committee will endeavor to search out the facts on this point.

The Department of Agriculture appropriation bill is up for passage in the House this week. I was disappointed that the appropriations committee did not increase the regular appropriation for forest products research. In its report, the committee justifies its action by expressing the belief that such research funds will be available from the various war appropriations during the next fiscal year. I hope their assumption is correct, but I am inclined to doubt it. However, it still may be possible to have additional research funds included when the bill is considered by the Senate, or needed appropriations can be made in a deficiency bill later.

Add this to the thousands of uses of forest products: sap from Australian milkwood trees is used to stupefy fish in waterholes so they may be easily caught.
