TRAGEDY

est fires. All of our forests, nation, state and private, are girded with patrols and observers. We have airplane spotting and radio and telephone communication. We have reserves of specially trained army and navy units to help fight fire.

Nevertheless, when a fire such as the one on Wilson river gets out of control, it illustrates the large part which LUCK plays — once a fire gets headway. We have NOT found any way to control humidity or winds. Given a vanishing humidity and winds a fire becomes almost unstoppable. Therefore the only sure control depends on PREVENTING FIRE. Promptness in fighting fire is only the second best method.

It takes close to 100 years to replace lost forests and Oregon's forest resources though still vast, are strictly limited. You hear much of "sustained yield" to guarantee the stability of Oregon's forest industries (65 per cent of our payrolls), but "sustained yield" depends almost entirely on complete and efficient fire protection.

For the post-war — when many of the present special aids in forest protection may be removed — that problem presents a challenge.
