Move Over, World

Last Thursday, the Kerby High School matriculated eighteen boys and girls into a world fatigued by the ravages of war, a nation beset by big shots carrying clubs too big to be in the hands of people who aren't as fully aware of their responsibilities as they are of their ability to wield the bludgeon; a world haunted by the spectre of sunken cheeks and empty bellies, a nation of shortages, inflation and too much money with nothing to spend it on.

Well, there it is, kids. Find yourselves a parking place and join in the game. MOVE OVER, WORLD, and let them in. They are a part of you now.

These youngsters have spent their entire school lives in the midst of aggression and the rattling of sabers and the thud of boots. When they entered the first grade, a little jerk with a silly mustache annexed by 'plebiscite' a small group of coal miners in a place called the Saar Basin. While they were in the sixth grade, this same little jerk roared into Poland. In their eighth year, another little jerk with silly-looking glasses and a shiny head sent his bombardiers to interrupt a peaceful Sunday morning for a peaceful people. The ensuing series of shattering events brought the world to the sharp realization that these men weren't just little jerks after all, but monsters bent on reducing the entire world to some sort of medieval serfdom.

These monsters have been crushed, but they have left their horrible mark, a scar which will never heal; a way of living that will never return. But the young boys and girls who have just finished high school, having spent their childhood and school days in this cataclysmic upheaval, never knew that way of life. So, out of the shambles left for them out of the conflict, these young people have the job of shaping a new way of life. The proposition now is to clear away the debris of the old, which obviously left much to be desired, and start the foundation for the new.

These youngsters may have their bobby socks, their jive talk, their obtuse passion for Frankie and so on, but we should never lose sight of the fact that circumstances have forced them to inculcate into their makeup a more realistic perspective of their own place in the new society in which they are going to have to live, and that leads us to believe that the world will be better off when these boys and girls, men and women now, get into the saddle and take over the reins. We have great faith in their ability to make a decent success of this new way of life. Maybe that is what we fought for (we must have fought for something) . . . we hope so.

So, again, there it is, kids. Grab yourselves a bat and step up to the plate. You'll get curves thrown at you, but stay in there and make 'em pitch to you. When you see one you like, take a healthy cut. We'll be up in the bleachers waiting for the ball — and we know we'll be waiting in the right place.
