Federal Bonus

Congress passed a soldier bonus measure which it hoped Harding would veto. He did. A majority ter. of the house members squar d themselves at home by voting to override the veto, and then, e ecording to program, the senate killed the bill. The following was in tyye last week:

If those two houses full of schoolboys at Washington ever shut their wind boxes long enough may be passed, so that the president can use that veto ax which he holds already ground and whetted for the job.

We have done a great deal, and men who, in the service of their country, have been crippled and anade unable to support themselves and any dependents they may have. We cannot do too much or without having been soldiers, are in such condition.

But those who came out of the struggle sound and in good health, and those who never even saw a battle field, have not been as badly treated as some imagine.
