COW COUNTIES BUNCOED

When the present Oregon road building program was launched it was made to look good to all Oregon. All Oregon needed better roads and prospectuses and maps were issued which pictured good highways that should accomodate all. The first issue of bonds was voted readily.

No total was mentioned that would cover the grand scheme of improvement so alluringly dangled before the voter. To tell the truth would have been to invite defeat in the election.

The first issue of bonds was soon swallowed up and the legislature took heart from the vote and legalized another without invoking a referendum.

When that drop had disappeared in the bucket the people were asked to vote another, the largest yet. By this time complaints had become numerous that the state commission was devoting the funds intrusted to it entirely to scenic highways and through routes that were already served by railroads, to attract tourists who would spend money in the favored cities.

This was voiced by the present editor of the Enterprise, who was then on the Brownsville Times. The state administration was republican and the republican daily newspaper published at the county seat, the Herald, replied that the market roads would be attended to in due time—as soon as the through road program could be completed. The complaints were too impatient. Well, some of them are impatient still, and some have died, and some have given up the homes they had built and have moved to town. The state board has quit promising to build market roads. It is dubious about securing funds to complete the through lines it has begun. It even flibed funds from a special market road fund in counties where it could cajole or browbeat county officials into acquiescence until Judges Kelly of Albany and Bingham of Salem put a stop to that robbery.

The road from Junction City and Eugene to Florence is part of a proposed east and west highway on the state program. It would open up some of the richest garden land in the state which lies idle because of inaccessibility. A long time ago the board promised to pave this road soon, which may mean before the end of the world. It has been graded over Low Pass mountain and partly rockd. A farmer in there writes:

I was told a couple of months ago, when I wrote to the governor, that the highway commission and the county court were well satisfied with Kern's progress rocking the low pass. Now I see the county judge is after the highway commission to get the rocking expedited, as Kern was given the job in April, 1922, to be finished in October, 1922. Five miles have been rockd, leaving eight, and no rock put on since last fall.

People in there should understand that not only their crop of farm produce is small, for want of a road to market, but they produce only a small crop of votes. More road work is being done where the latter crop is heavier.

Help for harvest is scarce.

The Lebanon cannery doubled its force this week.

During all these transactions Mrs. Penfield had been merely an attentive bit of background, but in the following few minutes she was called upon to take an active stand. It proved to be no simple matter to get Miss Lettie out of the store. So engrossed had she been in the purchases on her tentative list that she had scarcely cast a comprehending glance at other commodities; but now that her responsibility was over and her cash exhausted, she turned a fascinated eye upon tables and counters of alluring articles.

Lettie had never had anything to do with stores. This was the first time in her life that she had ever bought anything. The bustle, the glitter, the endless array, wrought havoc with her imagination, filled her with a frenzy of intoxication. Little cars with wheels that turned; dime banks that looked like the most blooming peaches on Mrs. Penfield's wall; games, books, toys! Marbles—imagine, twenty-four round pieces of baked terra firma for the ridiculous sum of five cents! How happy Crink would be! How Thad's soft eyes would bulge! It was more than could be borne.

"I don't care!" Lettie burst into frantic sobs that carried over a wide circle. "I don't care! Do you hear? I don't care!" Tears streamed down her face. She stamped her foot and swung her free arm with a violence and attitude that first grazed several astonished shoppers and then fed to a somewhat freer space around the child.

"Lettie, dear," expostulated Mrs. Penfield hurriedly, "remember where you are."

"I do," shrieked Lettie. "That's what the matter. I don't care. Some day I'll have things—oceans and heaps and oodles of things—millions more'n they've got here. I don't!"

"Lettie!" There was a finality in the word; there was also an expressive decision in the grasp of her arm. With swift skill Mrs. Penfield pushed her through the curious crowd, out of the store, to the comparative seclusion of a cross street.

"Lettie," she said sadly, "I'm ashamed of you, making a scene that way. I thought you were—"

"Oh, Penzie," interrupted the child, "I'm awful sorry. But I got so full, thinking, seemed as if I'd bust. I had to let her out, I got so dang'rous inside. All them things!" Her voice was freighted with suppressed rebellion. "Why, Crink and Thad would be tickled!"

"No, Lettie," interposed Mrs. Penfield, as they went on slowly, "they wouldn't be one mite happier. Land, the world wasn't never fixed up so unfair as that. 'Tain't the folks that have things that's happy; it's the folks that know they don't want things. When you get a little older, you'll see that the reason rich folks are unhappy is 'cause they got things; and the reason poor folks are unhappy is 'cause they want things. When folks get through twining their heart strings and their thoughts around things, then the world'll be miles nearer bliss than it is now."

Lettie's black eyes were wide with reproach. "Why, Penzie, you don't mean that Crink and Thad wouldn't like some of those—"

"Goodness, no, I don't mean they
