City and County Battle

There was some inaccuracy in a brief notice of litigation between Brownville and the county over the course of Calapooia river; as published in last week's Enterprise. Brownville denies that the river ever flowed where the county attempted to open a channel, on the city park property, since the white man came, if at all. The flooding of fruit farms and the Halsey road, she says, is the same action the river has always taken in time of high water. The city claims that representatives of the county have trespassed upon its property, broken down its levee, blasted out willows and earth that protected its property and laid themselves individually liable for damages because their acts were illegal.
