BRAGGADOCIO
By THOMAS ARKLE CLARK
Dean of Men, University of Illinois.

"YOUTH with its innocent boasts" is the way Alfred Noyes puts it. We are all hero-worshippers, and youth possibly more than old age; and worshipping the hero, we want to be like him; and wanting to be like him, we cast ourselves in his role. All of which is an adequate explanation of the boostings of youth. The booster is ambitious; he would like to arrive, but, too often, he has the ambition without the persistence and the energy to attain his ambition. I had a long letter from Bob a short time ago, written irregularly across the page with a pencil, reasonably legible but not always accurate. Bob is ten, and his ambition is to be an athlete. Red Grange and Harold Osborne and Pug Dougherty and Spike Rue are his heroes. There are a good many things of general interest going on in his family, but he makes no reference to these in his letter. His grandmother is seriously ill, but that is a matter of which he makes no mention in his communication. It is of his athletic accomplishments that he writes. He can dive deeper and swim farther and stay under the water longer than any other boy of his age in town. Some day he intends to swim the English channel or the Atlantic ocean. Nothing in aquatic sports is beyond him. Just now he is giving his mornings to pole vaulting and to high jumping. He has not attained the height reached by Brownell, but he is coming along—six feet two, I believe, is the record, and with practice he expects to do even better. We used to say that children were untruthful; now we admit that they are ambitious and have imagination, and Bob is letting his imagination help out distance, no doubt. Not all people boast of the same things. Warren wants to be a social star; he would like to be a knight with fair ladies breaking their hearts for love of him, so he boasts of his conquests, of the girls who write him sentimental notes and call him up on the telephone in an effort to make social engagements with him. The girls are crazy about him, he says, and in saying so he makes himself the sort of hero he would like to be. Samuels would like to hobnob with the rich and the great, and especially with the great, so he tells casually of "Last week when I was in Washington, President Coolidge said to me," as if he and the President were in the habit of having regular confidential talks with each other. He speaks of "my friend Douglas Fairbanks" or it may just as well be Senator Owen or Secretary Kellogg, or anybody of distinction whom Samuels has met, or has even had a passing glance at. It is pure boasting, of course, but it makes Samuels feel a good deal nearer to what he would like to be than he has really allowed.

We all boast a little, and by boasting, reveal our ambition.
