Things to Watch In Buying a Home

QUALITY OF CONSTRUCTION

In the completed house, it is difficult to tell just how good the house is, and it often reminds me of the story of the building foreman who came running in to the manager exclaiming, "One of our houses blew down last night!"

The manager was very much surprised as to how this could possibly happen, as there had been nothing but a breeze the night before. The foreman explained, "This could not have happened had the walls been papered as we intended to yesterday afternoon, and we could have sold the house today."

By starting in the basement and examining the walls, looking closely to see how the walls are as regards voids, large rocks poorly held in the cement, and the hardness and density of the walls, some idea may be had as to whether the concrete was properly mixed and proportioned.

Having examined the walls, by looking up you may see the floor joists. These should be free from all loose knots and on any span over six feet should be at least two-by-eight's. The said two-by-eight's should not span fourteen feet and should have bridging between each pair. A heavy six-by-eight sill should support the joists every ten to fourteen feet. The bottom of the floor will be visible between the joists from the basement. If the floor is double, as it should be, then wide boards may be seen, instead of the narrow boards which make up the finished floor.

Going into the interior of the house, examine all joints in the woodwork very carefully. If the work shows any signs of poorly fitting joints, rough wood, or in any way betrays laxness in workmanship, very likely this is the way the whole house has been built. Putty will cover a multitude of sins, so look closely. Mitred corners should be avoided, for they cannot be made to hold closely, owing to the shrinkage and expansion of wood. Examine the way the doors and windows fit. Clearance is necessary and requires about 1-16 inch space. More than this is generally another sign of poor workmanship. Look the painting over carefully, examining the edges of door panels and corners of casings for places where the paint has been poorly spread. As to the quality of the paint, unless you are an experienced painter, that is very difficult to detect once it has been spread.

The exterior should be gone over carefully, examining closely along under the eaves and cornice and around the porches as it is in these places that carelessness is very apt to be found. If no corner boards are used the corners should be covered with metal corner plates instead of mitring as is very commonly done. Owing to excessive moisture here at certain seasons, and dryness of others, mitred corners will spread apart as the wood expands and contracts, thus allowing dampness to work its way into the building with its resultant decay.

The roof should be examined from the attic, where a person may see the material used in the rafters and their bracing. For an ordinary roof, clear two-by-four's on two-ft. centers with about one brace in the middle of each rafter will be found satisfactory. The rafters should be covered with roof boards not over two and a half inches apart. The shingles should be a good vertical grain and even size grade with not less than two nails in each row. It is well to remember shingle, no matter how narrow that narrower shingles make the best roof when properly laid.

Plumbing, heating and wiring are among the topics to be discussed in later articles.
