"I hope you haven't Miss Pelly and myself in mind, Father," said Lee, laughing. "I'm willing to step into your trap tomorrow, and I'm more willing to step into it this minute."

Father McGrath looked at them quinzically. "Weel, we'll just say the day after tomorrow, Anderson," said. "For ye ken, Anderson, a wum man wants a leetle time to picture herself a bride in her mind's eye before she becomes one,"

CHAPTER XIV

The Best Laid Plans

Pather McGrath had insisted that Lee should remain as a guest at the mission during the two following days, and he insisted on supplying him with an outfit of clothing. He asked their plans and Lee told him.

"The best thing in the wurrid," he said. "Ye'll be safe at the house, and dinna ha' any fear of those de'll's agents at Siston lake, for they'll ken all aboot the pair o' ye long syne, and they darena interfere wi' ye the noo But dinna prolong your honeymoon too long, for ve must be oot o' the range before the heavy snaws begin."

Lee and Father McGrath had a long talk together that night. Lee told him the whole story of his encounter with Joyce in the range, the dynamiting, and his pursuit of the hand at Siston lake and rescue of the girl, culminating with their flight into the forest and Joyce's loss of memory.

At first the father listened and in terrupted, and kept giving vent to exclamations of amazement and indignation; but as Lee went on with his story he fell into silence, puffing at his pipe beside the stove and looking at

"Tis amazing!" he sald, when Lee had ended. "I canna understand it. For. look you, Anderson, It isna as if this was a country o' savages, whaur a base man could do what he pleased. 'Tis true they sell their feelthy hooch, but that's deeferent fra' kidnaping women and attempting murrder. There's something at the back o' this that we havena hit upon."

Next morning Lee slept late-so inte that it was the recitations of the school children across the open space that aroused him. From his bed he could hear Joyce's voice directing them, and he smiled happily at the thought of her. The morrow was his marriage day. The evening of the morrow they would be together in their log home, shut off from all the world.

It was a renascence of youth, this tender joy that filled him. He dressed and strolled across the interval to the
