NEW PROFESSOR ON EXTENSION STAFF

Appointment of Professor W. G. Beattie to an administrative position on the staff of the Extension Division of the University of Oregon was announced recently. The addition was made to fill a vacancy due to the readjustments necessitated by the resignation of Dean Earl Kilpatrick.

Beattie will give special attention to services to teachers and schools of the state. He will assist in adapting the visual instruction services more closely to the needs of the school.

The new faculty member is an alumnus of the University of Oregon in the class of 1901. He has had extensive experience as a teacher and administrator in the public schools, and for more than five years he has been a member of the faculty of the Oregon normal school at Monmouth. He will assume his duties with the extension division immediately.

FARM REMINDERS

An average fleece weight, or standard fleece weight, for each particular flock is decided upon by successful growers of farm sheep. All sheep not producing a standard fleece are culled from the flock. By culling the ewes that shear light fleeces, the average fleece weight for the flock increases. It is well to bear in mind that in all culling work two-thirds of the return from the ewes comes from the lambs and one-third from the wool.

The object of spraying for fungus diseases as explained by the Oregon experiment station is to cover all exposed surfaces with a fungus poison, which will kill the diseased spores, that would have been carried to the plant and thus prevent infections. Thoroughness in spraying is therefore essential to success, since any bit of unprotected surface will be an open port of entry for diseases. Pruning cuts and other wounds should also be protected by an antiseptic tree paint.

SPRAY AT ONCE FOR STONE FRUIT BLIGHT

Where blossom and twig blight of Oregon prunes, cherries, and apricots has been serious in the past, special attention to spraying them is recommended by the O. A. C. experiment station. The diseased spores are already being produced, and as soon as winter buds open they will start new infections.

In places where the disease has been severe in the past, particularly on apricots or other very susceptible varieties of fruit, a number of sprays will be required if the season is at all wet and favorable for spread of the disease.

The following program is suggested as soon as winter buds open, and before blossom buds appear: Use bordeaux 4-450, covering every bud and twig. In some sections as high as 8-8-50 strength is recommended. The second application with the same mixture is best applied as soon as the first blossom buds are opening. The third when the trees are in full bloom is effective.

Growers do not need to fear reduced fruit sets from this spray. The protection usually increases the set of fruit against blight.
