To the Editor:-

The other night I went to the picture show (and it was a good show too, Mr. Stiles) and I happened to sit in front of a pair of young sweethearts. I was sorry but I couldn't help overhearing a part of a lover's quarrel. I'm not telling who they were nor what all they said but the whole difficulty centered around a little mistrust of each other. They had been out a few nights before this and some other young folks were involved and each was a bit suspicious of the other's motives.

Now of course they finally relented and made up as sweethearts do. Afterwards, however, I thought it really too bad, for of course lovers will marry and establish new homes, but suspicion and mistrust are mighty poor foundation stones upon which to risk building the hope of life's happiness.

Then I thought, this is really one of the grounds upon which most of the difficulties in the world are based. We are so prone to mistrust each other's motives. Men may act from the purest and truest of motives but many suspiciously look for something hidden and sinister therein. Friends and neighbors are suspected of personal ambitions, jealousies and prejudices which they allow to control their conduct in life. Men watch each other at every turn, each believing the other is attempting to "put something over."

If one seeks to achieve some real goal and happens some evening to go to town on an errand, the other has watchers along the way to report how many steps were taken and if the man stumbled. Exaggerated? Yes, not quite this bad, but it shows the attitude of folks, and it's a very poor base for community happiness and prosperity.

We do not need suspicion and mistrust. Our greatest need is mutual confidence. That which makes us suspicious of each other is to be shunned as the vine is a vine. It eats away the vitality of individual life and ruins a community spirit.

Experts are testing miles-per-gallon-per-second on a Chevrolet at the great General Motors proving ground near Detroit. The device on the running board and the dash is an accurate "flow-meter" which records the amount of gasoline being consumed at any given speed under varying road conditions. This is the foundation for "Economic Transportation." Inset—"The Bath," a unique feature of the proving grounds where Chevrolets are tested to determine the engine's water tightness. The car in the picture was driven through the foot of water at 25 miles an hour all day without disrupting the ignition system.
