Decadence of the press has long been a subject of academic treatment by writers who contribute to the thinking minds of America. We have listened patiently to these literary hacks, who have mourned the passing of editorial vigor and domination, and have heard recitals of the tremendous influence of Greeley, Dana, Watterson, et al, upon the public.

The newspapers of today, we have been informed, are machine made, cut in the same pattern, lacking in individuality and utterly colorless. For fear of giving offense, they are reluctant to express whatever opinions repose in the seclusion of the editorial sanctum. The business office is supreme, and therefore the public should be treated to mild doses of pap, interspersed with occasional prescriptions of blab, blah. The reader must not be driven, lest he tuck. Soft words lead to great riches, and all that sort of tommyrot. Definite recommendation should be urged, for fear of reprisal in some fashion or another. We may eat, drink and be merry, but ever watchful of our step.

Let us consider Hal E. Hoss, successful contender for the nomination as Republican candidate for secretary of state. Practically uneducated in the delicate and subtle manipulation of politics, he was trotted into the arena as the newspaper candidate. In a sense he was, for he had long been active in the newspaper life of the state and had engaged in lively participation of organized effort in newspaper circles. He was not the candidate of a press association, because that strictly business institution eschews politics, but his numerous friends among the publishers of Oregon made up their collective minds to stage a demonstration for the information of doubters and scoffers, and for the benefit of Mr. Hoss, possessing faith in the effort of the performance. Editors had confidence in the ability and integrity of their own candidate, and they proceeded without hesitation to give him energetic and unqualified support.

Week in week out, their bellows blew. They hammered along consistently. Their thousands of readers became possessed of intimate familiarity with the candidate's name, his history, his achievements. One hundred and twenty-one newspapers of Oregon, most of them weekly publications, barged along in their editorial and news columns. They made a clean campaign, leaving the other aspirants severely alone. They were for Hoss, first, last, and all the time, and they have given the state a concrete illustration of the power of the up-state press, banded together in a mighty and effective unit, for a single accomplishment.

The editorial profession is human. It does not seek to control the politics of the state, but it took upon itself a self-imposed task and proceeded seriously and with the best intentions in the world to convince newspaper readers that Mr. Hoss, a newspaper man, should be chosen to occupy an important state office. They have succeeded, and in victory they have given the people a vivid demonstration of newspaper influence properly applied.

JOKING THE BUSY EDITOR

Of the many despicable characters with whom the average editor comes in contact, we do not know of anyone so vile as the sneak, who imposes upon the editor some fictitious item of news that appears innocent in the face.

Every editor has had an experience with such cowards who think that they can "get even" with some one by this pernicious method for ing the newspaper as a medium for their alleged humor or vicious slander.

A few weeks ago the Brinkley (Ark.) Argus was thus imposed upon, having printed an unsigned article giving an account of the marriage of two prominent young people. It developed that it was not true and was intended only as a joke. It was embarrassing to the editor, and the newspaper and the newspaper reflected no credit on the practical joker.

TAKING IT OUT IN TRADE

If the newspaper man does not respect his own profession, no one else will.

Editing and publishing a newspaper is as dignified a calling as that of the law, medicine or the ministry.

Long ago other business interests abandoned the system of trade and barter and went upon a cash basis. Newspapers for the most part have adopted the same plan. In some localities, however, the editors are still "taking it out in trade." There is no excuse for this antiquated system of business.

When the newspaper man reaches his point in his business that he demands cash for advertising and subscription, and says cash for the merchandise he buys, his business will have been placed upon that plane of dignity which he should insist upon.

How good news does spread! GENERAL GASOLINE is still the best. Adv 36 1/2

IT SEEMS TO ME

by Howard Boyd

That when a girl says "No," she hates to be misunderstood.

That taking things for granted is dangerous, in case of silverware.

That a frog in the throat is worse than two in the pond.

That nobody is to blame when the fault comes home.

That a woman can forgive a fool if she is the reason.

That some men are as effective as a joke without a point.

That the man is a genius who can write with a post office pen.

That lots of people are poor subjects for a mind reader.
