The statesman are making ringing speeches, but the practical politicians say that ringing doorbells makes more votes.

Ex-president Coolidge keeps telling the people they must economize, and the men are willing to do so on their wives' spring clothes anyway.

How to Raise Poultry
By Dr. L. D. LeGour, V. S., St. Louis, Mo.
Dr. LeGour is a graduate of the Ontario Veterinary College, 1899. Thirty-six years of veterinary practice on diseases of live stock and poultry. Eminent authority on poultry and its raising. Nationally known poultry breeder. Noted author and lecturer.

ARTICLE LI

Little Johnny, in his bath, with ears full of soap and soul full of rebellion, undoubtedly has no use whatever for the doctrine that cleanliness is just a pain in the neck, a devilish invention of grown-ups to keep a boy from his rightful occupation of play. Left to himself, he will most certainly have as little as possible to do with that particular kind of Godliness.

Most grown-ups recognize the desirability of personal cleanliness and of common sense sanitation in their homes and places of business. It is more comfortable to be clean after one has reached maturity and too inconvenient to suffer the expensive ills that result from unsanitary surroundings. When it comes to their poultry, however, that is quite a different story in all too many instances.

The same man who would recoil in horror from a fifth-century dish placed before him on his table allows his fowls to eat and drink from utensils that are no less an offense to decency because they are in the poultry yard instead of a dining room. He will howl his head off if Junior tracks a little mud onto the living room rug, but he will allow droppings, decomposed food material and other offensive litter to accumulate in his hen houses until they smell to high heaven. He is scrupulously careful about the laws near his house, but his chicken yard looks like that lower corner of the "south forty" after the last batch of city pluckers had done their worst to it. Then he wonders why his fowls are such poor layers, look so droopy and dispirited and so easily take on all the ills that chicken flesh is heir to.

The discoveries of Dr. Gorgas in Panama and of Dr. Noguchi, who recently died a martyr to science in Africa, have shown how certain kinds of mosquitoes transmit the germs of yellow fever. This suggests that such parasites as lice, fleas, mites, ticks and bedbugs, which so often infect chickens, may also be carriers of disease. There is reason for believing that such is the case, but whether they do or not, such parasites cause a heavy drain on the vitality of the fowls. That means decreased ability to block the progress of disease should infection occur from other sources.

The simplest kind of sanitary measures will make poultry houses and yards very unhealthy for germs and parasites, so why they should be tolerated is past understanding. Simple cleanliness is the first essential of sanitation. Poultry houses should be made so they can be scrubbed out occasionally and they should be regularly sprayed with coal tar dip and disinfectant.

No animal or vegetable matter should be allowed to remain exposed in yard or house until it begins to decay. All such material should be removed and burned or deeply buried. Be particularly careful so to dispose of fowls or animals that have died from one cause or another.

Drinking vessels and feeding equipment should be watched carefully. All fountains, troughs and hoppers should be so constructed that the fowls cannot get in them with their feet or roost on them, thereby befouling the contents with dirt or droppings. Fresh water should be given at least once a day. All feeding and watering equipment should be thoroughly scrubbed out, scaled or disinfected at frequent intervals.

Droppings are perhaps the most dangerous of all possible sources of infection. They are almost invariably breeding grounds for disease germs and also frequently harbor intestinal worms. These may be picked up by fowls not already affected, thus spreading the evil. Furthermore, nothing could be worse for fowls than to be compelled to roost just above a filthy droppings board. The odors and gases arising from droppings are extremely unhealthy. Continued breathing of air so contaminated weakens the lungs, thus making easy the progress of any disease which may be contracted later on. Both roosts and droppings board should be frequently cleaned and disinfected as droppings board should be free well as the whole house. It is also advisable to cover the droppings board with wire netting so the fowls cannot get into the droppings with their feet.

Should always be put to themselves and treated until it is safe to return them to the flock. If any considerable number of them show signs of the same trouble, they should all be taken out of the flock and a wholesale clean up should be made; clean out and disinfect all houses and equipment; clean up yards and in every way attempt to remove all possible sources of infection.

Not all of the possible sanitary measures can be discussed in an article of this kind, but some of the most important ones are described above. A good dip and disinfectant used regularly and conscientiously will go a long way toward making disease impossible in your poultry flock, not forgetting the most effective of all—God's own great sterilizers, fresh air and sunshine. It is not as easy to keep things sanitary as it is to let them go to pot, but it does keep down disease and THAT PAYS.

Hens that are heavy, robust, strong, free from parasites and disease are better layers, better breeders and are worth more on the market than those that are neglected and compelled to get along as best they can. Maintaining sanitary conditions may mean work, but it is neither difficult nor as trying as fighting disease and it is infinitely more profitable.

Basement Is Place for Sewing Room

A SEWING ROOM in the basement is an ideal arrangement because it does not take up valuable space upstairs and is, if anything, even handier than a second-floor location. Such a room may be made light, warm, attractive and convenient. Also, it is close to the laundry where the ironing board and iron may be kept ready for pressing without interruption of the seamstress' work.

An excellent basement layout, conforming to an actual house plan, is shown here. The Holland warm air furnace is placed near the center of the house. The coal bins are close to it and on the driveway side, convenient for filling. The laundry tubs are beneath the plumbing upstairs. Note the amount of storage space for wood, garden tools and preserves.

All these several features are possible in the average basement if a warm air heating plant of modern type is installed. The latest model of Holland furnace is one which embodies a new invention, a fan unit which moves the air at a much higher velocity than the force of gravity, which is the propelling force in the old style heater.

This style of heating plant is designed attractively and finished in red and black—a far cry from the unsightly appearance of the ordinary dwelling house heater. Furthermore, its overall dimensions are less than the space occupied by the ordinary warm air furnace and its intake pipe. For this reason, such a plant will allow ample room for all the basement accommodations shown here without any difficulty.

The sewing room is partitioned off with either matched lumber or wallboard. It will be more attractive if the masonry walls are painted and floor joists above are covered with wallboard. A fine treatment for the floor would be battlement linoleum, cemented down and varnished. Or a thick rug might be put down. But if these things are too costly, it might be well to use inexpensive rugs of attractive light colors. A heat lamp from the furnace to the sewing room will supply ample heat to keep it comfortable, and in the summer it probably will be one of the coolest rooms in the house.

By all means build in a set of shelves to hold the boxes and baskets of sewing materials. An old chest of drawers, enameled in an attractive color, makes a splendid piece of sewing room furniture.
