DAIRYING

so that the cow is standing on the level.

Concrete mangers are fine because they can be thoroughly cleaned. Put a removable partition between each manger so that the animals will not get into each other's feed. The reason for making them removable is to permit flushing out the manger with a hose. A simpler way of keeping the cattle from getting into each other's food is to run two or three iron bars across between each feeding section. By building the feeding platform on a level with the top of the manger the food can be easily pushed back.

However, by building the manger about six inches higher than the alleyway we prevent dirt and dust from the floor mixing with the food. In building a cement manger, be sure to have all the corners rounded to make the cleaning easier.

The building of a gutter is important from the standpoint of cleanliness. A width of sixteen inches and a depth of ten or twelve inches is recommended. Too deep a gutter may cause the cows to slip and injure themselves. At the same time they should be of such depth that the cattle will not stand in them with their hind feet. Have the edge of the gutter that is nearest the cow a little higher than the edge next the alley so that the cow will gradually step up.

When it comes to selecting the stanchions, any number of styles are available. The stanchion most popular, perhaps, hangs on a swivel at top and bottom. It is made of steel and has a wooden lining. This is quite an advantage over the rigid stanchion because it allows the cow greater freedom. A slip chain tied to a double post is also comfortable.

As a final touch to a model dairy barn, have two or three box stalls, depending upon the size of the herd. They are invaluable for sick animals and for pens in which to place calves. If possible, the stalls should be in another part of the barn, away from the milking cows.
