Poor Wooden Indians Vanish, Antiques Exposition Indicates

LO! The poor wooden Indian! He is truly the vanishing American. Through the United States Indian Bureau may say that living Indians are not vanishing, their wooden effigies which once inhabited every town where there was a cigar store, will still be no more. The few still in existence have stepped into the antique class, bringing prices at art galleries that would have made the cigar merchants who used to keep them for advertisements, gasp. Despite the ready market, a recent antiques exposition in New York City exhibited only one.

The solitary wooden Indian brooded aloof on his pedestal, a price tag of $350 attached to him. In all New York City there remain only two cigar store redskins on active duty, although a bronze statue of one stands in the offices of a large cigar company. They are lonely reminders of the change in the cigar taste of the nation—a desirable change, since it centers on introduction of machinery in cigar manufacture and the growing popularity of the five cent cigar made by modern methods which eliminate the possibility of spit-tipping and other unsanitary practices.

Modern advertising methods have kept the pace with manufacturing processes. The stiff wooden Indian had to give way to live, informative advertising that reached the whole public through newspapers and other means. So the impassive wooden Indian marched with dignity to his doom—generally as the back log of a fireplace.

Not All Soap Is Used For Washing

AMERICA had a soap bill last year that totaled well over $100,000,000, but all that money didn't go to keeping the country clean. Some of it went into the fashioning of the 5,500 soap sculptures for the Seventh Annual Competition of Small Sculptures in White Soap for $1,100 in prizes.

The competition is sponsored by the National Soap Sculpture Committee which lists among its members such well known names as Alexander Archipenko, Clement J. Harthorn, Gutzon Borglum, Charles Dana Gibson and Lorado Taft.

Peter P. Ott, New York sculptor, won first prize of $500 in the professional division of the competition.

In the International Division, a special section for entrants from foreign countries, Anny Seidl of Vienna was awarded first prize of $125.

In the advanced amateur class, which attracts hundreds of entries and brings sculptures from all classes of people, Camille K. Castaing of Brooklyn, N. Y., won first prize of $200 for his "Rabbit." From the contestants in this same group, Felix Kowalewski, a student at the N. Y. Institution for the Deaf, and winner of an honorable mention, was selected as the young artist most deserving of the scholarship award for a year's study in an art school to be chosen by him. This award is given to the prize winner in the senior group whose work shows the most promise.

Thirteen year-old Stephen Sumachick of New York City won the first prize of $50 in the junior group for his "Polar Bear."

The Gorham Award, offered for the single piece chosen from the entire competition by the Gorham Company, as best suited for reproduction in bronze, was given to Jeannette Yost of Chicago for "My Woodland Friend." This piece was also awarded second honorable mention in the professional class.

(1) "Running Elephant" by William Ph. Bohn of Bellevue (Pittsburgh), Pa., winner of third prize of $200 in the Professional Group. (2) "Maske" by Anny Seidl of Vienna, Austria, winner of first prize of $125 in the International Group. (3) "My Woodland Friend" by Jeannette Yost of Chicago, Ill., winner of the Gorham Award and second honorable mention in the Professional Group. (4) "Meditation" by Claribel H. Gaffney of Los Angeles, Calif., winner of second prize of $300 in the Professional Group.

The subjects of the sculptures in the competition are many and varied. Abraham Lincoln is the most popular historical subject, appearing 81 times. George Washington, Theodore Roosevelt, President Hoover, Al Smith, Lindbergh, Will Rogers, Marshal Foch and other famous men and women are each represented many times.

Comic strip characters including Pop-eye, Able, Skippy and Mickey Mouse have taken shape in soap, many of them carved from sketches submitted by their creators.

Everything from Swiss mountaineers to American farmers, canaries to albatrosses, ships to jazz musicians, The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, and Rin-Tin-Tin are numbered among the 5,500 carvings in the exhibition.

Soap carving is extremely simple.

OUR RIDICULOUS BRAKE SITUATION
A Simple Remedy for a Vital National Problem.

THE HEART OF THE SAFETY PROBLEM—BRAKES!

THEIR SAFETY DEPENDS ON THE BRAKES

By J. RITCHIE MACDONALD

It is time the American public came to its senses in the matter of automobile brakes.

Brakes that are worn or out of adjustment are a prolific cause of the automobile accidents which are killing thirty-three thousands of our people a year, sending more than 900,000 others to the hospital, many of them maimed for life. This is the evidence produced by nationwide surveys made by the makers of Rusco brake linings, and by insurance companies, safety councils, state motor commissioners and other responsible authorities. And yet, in spite of the obvious simplicity of the remedy for this particular phase of the dreadful accident situation, approximately eight million of our 26,735,000 cars are running at high speeds on congested, over-motorized highways with dangerously worn or mis-adjusted brakes!

Some day, in the opinion of W. T. Palmer, of the Rusco concern, the automobile accident problem will be reduced to an irreducible minimum. This will not come all at once, but bit by bit, phase by phase. The silly brake phase can be cured right now. It is, however, an arduous task. It means teaching millions of motorists that keeping brakes in perfect condition is as vital and should be as instinctive as winding their watches, insuring their lives and locking up their houses at night.

All over the country "safety lanes," city and state "brake inspection weeks" and other constructive efforts are being conducted to awaken motorists to the murderous and brake situation. In some states compulsory brake inspection is enforced with excellent results. But the general progress is discouragingly slow.

A test has recently been held in various parts of the country which illustrates this situation with almost painful clearness. Cars were stopped at random, containing jolly motoring parties, women out shopping, salesmen on their business trips and many others. Only 47 per cent were able to stop in what engineers consider a satisfactory distance. Some went far beyond the mark—a positive menace to themselves and other drivers on the road.

Bad brakes are causing thousands of deaths and injuries and millions of dollars of property damage every year. The end of this cause of accidents will come when motorists realize how vital and inexpensive it is to keep brakes in proper order.
