Acid Test Given U. S. Products In Building Over New Zealand Gas Pool

Government Bath Building and One of Pools.

CHICAGO—The new Government bath emporium at Rotorua, New Zealand, erected over a boiling mud pool that constantly emits deadly gases which quickly destroy ordinary construction materials, is attracting the attention of architects, builders and engineers throughout this country because of the American products used in the structure. Great difficulty was experienced not only in erecting the building, but in obtaining materials for its construction that would withstand the tremendous heat and the disintegrating effect of the carbonic and sulphuric acid and sulphuretted hydrogen gases of the pool. During certain phases of the construction, the workers were compelled to wear gas masks, into which fresh air had to be pumped constantly during their operations. Boards made of preswood material manufactured at Laurel, Miss. were used for panelling the walls and ceilings throughout the building. In one of the bathing pools enclosed within the structure, the bricks had to be specially made of leadless glaze and laid in molten sulphur, as cement disintegrated rapidly in the waters of the pool. The erecting engineer states that one of the only metal having better properties in this building, as anything with lead or copper as part of the alloy quickly disintegrates.

Chorines Revive "Bobbing for Sweets" Game

A bevy of beauties from "Everybody's Welcome," a current Broadway production, show how it's done. (At right) Ann Pennington who revived the "bobbing" past-time.

BROADWAY, some folks seem to think is the last place in the world to look for old-fashioned ideas or customs. Maybe so, but believe it or not, those "pretty potatoes" as the columnist says, who dance behind the footlights, have gone back to grandmother's diary for some bright new ideas on how to pass the time between acts and after. For instance, they take a long piece of string and fasten one end to the overhead plumbing, just like grandmother used to fasten package cord to the barn rafters. Then a neat piece of wire is hooked through a chocolate and tied to the string. From that point on, it's speed that counts. "The secret behind getting more than your share," says Ann Pennington who started the fad, "is to avoid the caramels. They slow you up. It's a great game and besides, it's one way of handing the girls an adequate ration of sweets. Most of us you know, don't get enough of the sugared foods in our diet and if you don't believe they're necessary, try hooking it through three acts with nothing under your belt but a lettuce sandwich."
