Money to Burn

By Peter B. Kyne

STORY FROM THE START

Hiram Butterworth, miser, decides to leave his fortune to Elmer Clarke, a poor nephew. Butterworth tells Aboum McPeak, his lawyer, of a deal forty years ago in which he swindled a man out of $10,000 and arranged for payment with interest. Butterworth dies suddenly. Through a gossiping telegraph operator the town of Pilarcitos, including Nellie Cathcart, Elmer's sweetheart, learns of his inheritance before he dies. Nellie tells Elmer it amounts to more than $1,000,000. They confess their love for each other. "Colorado Charlie" and his partner, Mae, decide to pluck Elmer. Unknown to Elmer, Nellie is heir of the man Butterworth swindled. She figures that about $1,000,000 will be due her from the estate. Elmer becomes a candidate for school trustee. Posing as a newspaper reporter, named Doris Gatewood, Colorado Charlie's confederate calls on Elmer. Nellie sees Doris and spots her as an adventuress. Elmer goes to Los Angeles and is welcomed by Doris and her "brother." Nellie takes steps to frustrate the crooks. Elmer is elected school trustee and becomes a candidate for mayor.

Fourteenth installment "Elmer," she said suddenly, "you're unhappy. Am I the cause of your unhappiness?" He nodded, afraid to trust himself to speak. "Well, we're not engaged, Elmer, so speak freely. Is there another girl?"

"Unhappily there is, Nellie." "Unhappily for whom?" "For both of us," he finally ground out.

"Speak for yourself, Elmer," she countered. "Are you very unhappy about it?" "Quite."

"Why?" "You ought to know," he complained. "I am not a mind reader, Elmer. That's why I ask questions. Now that you have decided on a new sweetheart, are you dissatisfied with your selection?"

"No-o!" He was ready to weep. "It lacerates me, Nellie, but I had to tell you. A fellow's got to come clean with a girl like you—no use to play a double game. I—I've made a mistake. Took you out tonight to tell you—thanks for helping me with the dirty job—"

"Please do not mention it, Elmer, dear. It's my fault entirely. Nobody knows better than I the risks I'm taking—and I'm much too wise to think a mere man can be a paragon. You were quite within your rights in following the dictates of your wandering fancy. I thought you might want to some time, so I decided to give you a free hand and let it happen now. I entertain no resentment, Elmer, and there isn't the slightest necessity for you and me discontinuing our lovely friendship. I am of the opinion that you do not know any more about women than a gopher does about astronomy and I am perfectly willing that you should have a wide experience before I take on the job of educating you. To date you're the finest man I have ever met and I'm not going to ruin my happiness by letting you escape. I'll get you yet, Elmer. Meanwhile, enjoy yourself."

"And you're not angry with me, Nellie?" "Not the least little bit."

"You're positively wonderful!" "You're positively childish. But then most men are—where women are concerned. Dear old boob!" she murmured. "I understand you so well that explanations aren't necessary. Cheer up, Elmer, and be happy. By the way, the town is agog with excitement over your threat to run for mayor. Did you mean it?"

"Surest thing you know, Nellie."

"Great news! Well, here we are at home. Good night, Elmer. God's in his heaven, and all's right with the world!" She gave him her hand at parting. "Whatever you do, Elmer, use your head and not your heart. Be sure you're right and go ahead."

"I want to kiss you," he half growled.

"You are a philanderer, aren't you? Well, what's a kiss more or less between friends—and ex-sweethearts? There!"

She was gone. Elmer sat at the wheel of his expensive imported automobile and watched the little white figure disappear within the darkly home without one backward glance.

"Well, that's over," he told himself, "and I don't know whether I'm happy or broken-hearted. Nellie's so practical and conservative she's hard to understand, but I'll say this of her: she's something that mighty few women are—and that's a true blue sport!"

He went home and didn't sleep a wink.

For two weeks Elmer fought the deadly life of the idle rich around Pilarcitos. And each day of that awful two weeks he wrote to Doris Gatewood. As her accepted suitor he felt it incumbent upon him to put a note of tenderness in his lengthy epistles, but for the life of him he could not make that note ring true. Doris, however, appeared to suffer from no such inhibition. Hers were sufficiently sentimental to suit the most exacting male.

Also she was quick to note the restraint in Elmer's correspondence and chided him with it. She bade him assure her that he loved her—and only her. Thus cornered, Elmer gave the assurance demanded—writing. Later, upon request, he sent his photograph, on which appeared these words: "To Doris, from her devoted Elmer."

Then suddenly, like a swooping falcon, came a heartbreaking letter. Poor dear Harvey had investigated all of his little principal in an enterprise which had failed. The shock of this terrible loss had sickened him, and at the moment he was, according to no less than two doctors, developing an abscess in his right lung, due to the gassing he had received in France. Her income, earned as a correspondent for the American Weekly, was insufficient to support them even in the humble style to which they had been accustomed, and she faced the terrible necessity of seeking Harvey bundled off to a public hospital, where he could send her a thousand dollars to tide them over, et cetera.

"I know it," Elmer soliloquized. "I smelled that touch coming, only I thought it would come from Harvey. Well, one thing is certain—they need that thousand dollars badly, or Doris could never have asked me for it."

Still wrapped in the fogs of misunderstanding and still in incomplete possession of his senses, Elmer sent her a check on the Pilarcitos Commercial Trust & Savings bank for the sum in question. Two days later the check was returned through a Los Angeles bank for payment.

Now, it so happened that Alice Goodfellow had had an attack of the megrims that day and in consequence Nellie Cathcart had to take over Miss Goodfellow's task of posting the customers' ledger. Naturally, as she sorted the checks at the close of the day's business preparatory to charging them up, she came across Elmer B. Clarke's check for the sum of one thousand dollars, in favor of Doris Gatewood, and here, in addition, the endorsement of Harvey Gatewood and the Los Angeles bank. Pasted to the check was a small red label bearing the words "Please wire if uncollectable." Evidently the Los Angeles bank had taken the check for collection only.

"Fess work, Doris darling," Nellie murmured. From a stack of printed tags she selected one and checked off in red ink from a long list of standard excuses for failure to honor a check the excuse that she knew would start a riot between Elmer and the payee without involving her, to wit: "Signature of indorser irregular." And that was absolutely true, since Nellie knew the names in both cases were fictitious. With a little sash of malice she inclosed the rejected check in an envelope and shot it back to the Los Angeles bank.

"And now," she murmured to the adding machine, "we shall see that which we next see. This new love of Elmer's will wire for an explanation and he will come over to the bank with blood in his lover's eyes and demand an explanation of Anse Moody. Old Anse will call me in and scold me for being stupid and I'll have to hand Elmer out number one. Adversities and other jolts will follow in rapid succession. Alas, poor Elmer!"

Events fell out even as Nellie had foretold. A devil with a whip of fire drove Elmer Clarke to the bank early the next afternoon. His check had been questioned, the love of his life had called him hysterically on the telephone, and he had to do or die. Only, as he was figuratively dying, he cursed himself for his stupidity in sending Doris his own me. Why in the name of common sense had he not purchased a cashier's draft in his own name, and indorsed it to Doris?

Well, there was nothing to do now save to go through with the early creation, so with a flashing eye that belied his trembling soul he stalked into old Anse Moody's lair and in a thundering voice demanded that astounding individual what the devil he meant by refusing payment on one of his checks.

"Don't know a thing about it, Elmer," old Anse protested humbly. "Alice Goodfellow tends to all that, she was sick yesterday and Nellie Cathcart posted up the customers' ledger. I reckon Nellie knows why she done it. Step over to her cage and ask her, boy."

Nellie looked up from her work as Elmer's face appeared at her window.

"Yes, I did it, Elmer," she confessed. "I thought perhaps you had acted hastily in the matter and I wanted to give you some time to think it over. I hoped you might change your mind before the check should be paid and tell us to stop payment."

"I know what I am about," he replied quietly. "May I suggest that hereafter you mind your own business and leave me the minding of my own? Those signatures were perfectly regular and you know it. I want you to wire that Los Angeles bank to send the check back to this bank for payment. Why, Nellie, you must be looney to do such a thing!"

"Sorry I missed that one," Nellie replied complacently, "but watch me line out the next ball that passes over the plate. Run along now. I assure you I have no desire to laugh in your face—you're big."

His face turned white with fury. Disdaining further argument he left the bank abruptly, while Nellie wired the Los Angeles bank to return the check for further examination of the signatures of the indorsers.

That night, when his colored retainer, Jasper, summoned Elmer to dinner, the latter found a fat, plain envelope beside his plate. It bore a Los Angeles postmark. After reading its contents Elmer's appetite failed him completely. He sat motionless, staring wildly into space.

Presently Elmer's fox terrier, Benji, becoming alarmed at his master's rigidity and silence, came to the latter's chair and uttered a short, friendly little bark. Elmer paid no attention to him, so Benji favored his master with a little bite on the shin—whereupon Elmer B. Clarke rose to his feet in agony and with a well directed kick slidded the surprised Benji fifteen feet across the room.

The first thing Nellie Cathcart saw, as the curtain went up before her window at ten o'clock the next morning, was Elmer Butterworth Clarke. He said very distinctly: "Stop payment on that Gatewood check, please."
