Find Sugared Mortar Used In Old New England Church

Plaster Samples from Malden Structure Under Scrutiny of Scientists

Above: The Faulkner M. E. Church at Malden, Mass. Inset: Rev. Revilo M. Standish, pastor, examining a sample of sugared plaster which is now being studied by Mellon Institute scientists. MALDEN, MASS. — This quiet New England city is today basking in the scientific spotlight through discovery here of what is believed to be one of the few buildings in the United States built with common cane sugar used as one of the construction materials. Interest in the building, the Faulkner Memorial Methodist Church, was aroused following the rediscovery by Mellon Institute scientists, of an ancient building secret which called for the use of sugar in lime sand mortar mixtures. According to Mellon Institute reports, the addition of a small amount of sugar, about six pounds to each 100 pounds of quicklime, increases the tensile strength of the mixture by more than sixty percent. As a result of this discovery it is now being freely predicted that skyscrapers of the future, built with sugar, will last longer and be far stronger than the buildings of today. Mellon Institute officials pointed out that the secret of sugar's place in building construction was known to the Romans and was used freely by them. Records covering the use of sugar in the Faulkner Church here are rather obscure. According to Charles E. Clark, Malden contractor, the church was built in 1907 by the late John Fox, one-time prominent builder of this city. Fox, according to Mr. Clark, was given to experiments and through one of these, learned that sugar acted as a retardant to keep plaster from setting too rapidly. Fox apparently was not primarily concerned with the strengthening qualities of sugar. The church records show, however, that very few repairs have been made to the building. Its low repair cost is considered remarkable in view of the rigorous New England winters, which have made it necessary to patch and repatch other buildings in the vicinity of similar though later construction. Samples of the plaster have been sent to Mellon Institute to determine the tensile strength after twenty-five years of service.
