FORESEE MORE POTATOES IN WEST

More potatoes than last year in the western states as a group, but less in the north and eastern states and in the country as a whole is the prospect for 1935, according to the annual potato outlook report of the Oregon State college extension service, released through county agricultural agents.

"The outlook is for a late potato crop roughly estimated somewhere in between the 1932 and 1933 crops, both in the whole country and in the western states as a group," says the report.

This outlook is based upon the acreage indicated by the government report of growers' intentions to plant, and assumes average growing conditions. In 1934, yields averaged 9 per cent above average in the whole country, owing to unusually favorable conditions in the eastern and New England states.

Production in the western states as a group may be expected to be considerably greater than in 1934, as growers reported intentions to increase the acreage slightly and yields in 1934 for this group of states were 20 per cent below the 1929-1934 average.

Potato prices have advanced sharply during the past month in western markets and have reached a level about in line with a year ago along the coast. Eastward, the advance has been smaller, with a slight decline registered in Maine from mid-February to mid-March. Price trends during the rest of the season may have some effect on plantings this year.

Representatives from western potato producing regions met with extension service and federal AAA officials in Pocatello, Ida., the third week in March to consider proposed is suffering from an infected throat, which has impaired her voice to such an extent that she will not be able to take care of her work the rest of the year. Her sister, Mrs. Bixby, who formerly taught the first grade, will have charge of the work until the close of school this summer.

Grave Clothes

Mary sounds the alarm—There she stands that first Easter morning, pounding on the door. She wants Peter and John, fishermen from up North, lodging at this place here in Jerusalem.

"They have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid Him," is her cry. This brings action. The two disciples foot-race it across the city to the garden of the rich man, Joseph of Arimathea. John, being the younger, is first to reach the tomb. Sure enough! Roman seal broken, mammoth stone rolled back from the mouth of the tomb and there within lie the linen clothes in which they had wrapped the Lord. Now Peter comes up and goes in with John following.

"What were His grave clothes like, tell us, John?" "An empty cocoon," he could say. "Shaped like a man's body—wide at the shoulders, narrower at the hips, and on down to the feet" For with linen clothes and a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes they had bound the Lord's body round about for the burial, and now only these coverings were left. The napkin that had been about His head wrapped apart by itself. They could stoop and peer into the empty shell. The Lord had gone from it; risen from among the dead. Death could never hold the Author of all life.

"Because I live, you shall live also," says He. Let His saved ones step to the next hard task, looking utterly to Him; He still lives and is yours with the grace and power for all life's burdens. Let the lost thank God that He had a Son Who died for their sins and Who rose again that they might have life, and have it more abundantly.
