RACKET SWINDLES JOB SEEKERS

A new "job selling racket" is reported by the Portland Better Business Bureau, in which victims are swindled out of small payments only to find that the supposed employer has disappeared and the promised job is non-existent.

According to comlaints filed with the Portland Bureau, the promoter of this scheme contacts young men and offers them positions as truck drivers, representing that he holds a hauling contract with a large tire distributor and is adding a number of trucks to his fleet. After employment terms have been arranged, he collects a three dollar fee from his prospective employees, which he says is to pay for an "inter state permit".

Several men were hired in this manner in Portland last week, and were told to report at a designated location at three o'clock in the morning. The self-styled employer, however, failed to arrive. Subsequent investigation by the Better Business Bureau reveals that this promoter is unknown to the tire company. The Bureau characterizes the deal as a vicious, petty racket designed to bunco job-seekers, and warns that this swindler may attempt to operate the same scheme in other Oregon communities.

DEMOCRATIC VICTORY DOUBTFUL

(By John W. Kelly)

By systematic "sampling" of public opinion over a period of months, republicans are confident that Oregon can be placed in the Landon column in November.

Following facts have been developed by the series of repeated tests of sentiment; President Roosevelt's popularity is on the decline; the administration has lost so many former supporters that a repetition of the 1932 landslide as out of the question; there has been a steady and substantial increase in sentiment for Governor Landon, this sentiment coming from voters who were in the Roosevelt camp.

Other facts included in the surveys included evidence that republicans who stood by their ticket four years ago have no intention of deserting their party this year, whereas many republicans and conservative democrats who voted for Mr. Roosevelt in 1932 will not do so a second time.

It was a protest vote that enabled Mr. Roosevelt to carry Oregon in 1932 by 77,852 majority; in the current campaign the protest vote, whatever its strength, will go to Mr. Landon, for a protest vote is always cast against the incumbent.

Estimates vary as to the number of votes Mr. Roosevelt has lost. If only 25,000 have changed this would reduce his 1932 majority of 77,852 to 27,000. If 20 percent or even 15 percent of Mr. Roosevelt's supporters have deserted him for one reason or another, his majority is wiped out or so near the vanishing point that his carrying Orebon is a matter of grave doubt.

Impartial observers are of the opinion that Mr. Roosevelt has lost no less than 15 percent of his 1932 adherents. This is a matter that can be checked by anyone asking the first 100 men and women who voted for Roosevelt if they intend giving him their ballot in November. Such tests will vary with each 100 people, but the average of Roosevelt desertions exceeds 15%.

In calculating defections from the New Deal, it should be remembered that some replacements will come from the crop of first voters, but these recruits cannot offset more than a small percentage of the losses.

Having assembled the evidence deducted by the "sampling" process, the republican leaders are satisfied that Oregon is no longer a solid Roosevelt state—it has never gone democratic for president but twice in its history—and is now actually in the doubtful column. Encouraged by the situation revealed, republican leaders are preparing to redouble their efforts in the remaining weeks of the campaign.

In partial confirmation of the hopes of the Republicans, Democrats on the inside of their party organization admit there has been a slip away from Mr. Roosevelt, and to such a degree that they don't expect to sweep the state by any such a large majority as was given the New Deal in 1932. Practical men in the democratic high command are not deluding themselves; they recognize that the result in Oregon looks like a horse race.
