BRANTON DISCUSSES ELECTRIC BROODER

Recent developments in electric brooders have greatly improved both the under-heat and over-heat types until the choice is largely a matter of personal preference or local conditions, believes Ivan Branton, agricultural engineer at the Oregon Experiment station.

Satisfactory home-made brooders of either type may be made, plans for the under-heat type being available at the State college and for the over-heat brooder from various commercial concerns.

The Oregon bottom-heat electric brooder was developed jointly by the departments of poultry husbandry and agricultural engineering at the State college, and has proved highly successful for a number of years. At a rather low cost a farmer may build a safe, efficient and reliable brooder by following the prepared plans available free.

The OSC under-heat brooder keeps the chicks on the screen, which provides a sanitary roosting platform free from moisture. This eliminates the wet litter problem and ventilation is taken care of by the natural flow of air in the brooder and by an adjustable ventilator in the top.

The newer type over-heat brooders now use a fan to force heated air down over the chicks and out of the brooder below the curtain. This dries the litter and also provides fresh air for ventilation. Where home-made over-heat brooders are contemplated, Branton urges that such fans be included.

Attempts to build and operate home-made brooders that are not constructed from approved plans has frequently proved hazardous in the past, both from the standpoint of fire and from the operator's own safety, Branton points out. He also urges that care be taken to see that the wire which serves the brooder house is large enough to care for the extra load of brooder operation. Where the No. 12 or No. 14 copper wire, commonly used for lights only, is relied upon, the loss of current is so great that trouble is frequently encountered in making the brooder heat properly. Where more than two brooders are operated, a three-wire service is recommended.
