Commander MacMillan Heads North Again

THE nose of his stout schooner, Bowdoin, is headed north once again and Commander Donald B. MacMillan, most famous of modern explorers, is off on a 6,000-mile adventure amid ice, snow and the shy people of the Arctic Circle.

But Commander MacMillan, in his Arctic expeditions, has been the humanitarian as well as the scientist and explorer.

Eskimo boys and girls will be clothed and fed by the man who for thirty years has been their best friend. They will have their teeth treated in free dental clinics. Their MacMillan-Moravian Mission School will receive new supplies. Warm clothing will be theirs to meet the Arctic winter.

A few days before the Bowdoin sailed from Boothbay Harbor, Me., on June 25, Commander MacMillan interrupted his work for a few minutes to tell of this phase of the expedition.

"We're loading the Bowdoin again with food supplies and equipment for the school at Nain," he said. "I'm endeavoring to feed, clothe and educate forty children there. We have also loaded dental supplies for the three free dental clinics established by me at Makkovik, Hopedale and Nain. Dental work is one of the most acute needs there."

Commander MacMillan built the schoolhouse at Nain in 1927 to shelter, clothe, feed and educate forty little Eskimo children. Miss Katie Hettasch, daughter of the Moravian missionary, volunteered as the teacher. The school became a center of life and social service for the community. Stoutly built to resist the severe climatic conditions, it's well built walls, brightly bordered windows and attractive mineral-surfaced asphalt shingle roof have made the "Farthest North" school a Labrador landmark.

The trim shingles of the roof have added to the appearance of the building but even more important in this isolated community of no organized fire department is the fact that the roof is fire-resistant. Warm fires are necessary to keep the building comfortable through the long Arctic winter but warm fires too often mean chimney sparks which, lodging on a non-fire resistant roof, could be fanned into a disastrous blaze. This is a chance the little mission school could not take. It won't happen on the mineral surface of this asphalt shingle roof.

The school, as a result of Commander MacMillan's activity in creating interest in the Far North, is lighted with electric lights, filled with books, supplied with food, clothing and sleeping bags for the youngsters. Children come from all parts of Labrador to live at the school from early fall until summer.
