Red or Black Hair Does Not Mark Man's Ability

Hair doesn't seem to afford any index to genius or character. It is true that among the important personages history has turned up there have been a good many red-heads, but the number does not appear to be greater, proportionately, than the number of red-haired persons among the less important, declares a writer in the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

John Bunyan had red hair, for one. And Peter the Great's was red. And Swinburne's was red. James Russell Lowell's hair is described as having been ruddy or auburn, and Andrew Jackson's was "reddish sandy." Savonarola had reddish eyelashes, according to accounts of him, while Thomas Hobbes had reddish whiskers. The hair of U. S. Grant was a reddish brown, and that of William the Silent was auburn. And Calvin Coolidge's hair was not far from red when he was a young man.

To show that red-haired persons have no monopoly of talent, here are the names of a few outstanding figures whose hair was black: Matthew Arnold, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Stephen A. Douglas, William Hazlitt, Charles Lamb, John Marshall, Daniel Webster, John Greenleaf Whittier, John Paul Jones, Sir Arthur Sullivan.

Among those whose hair was classified as "dark" were Browning, Alexandre Dumas, Robert Louis Stevenson, Rossetti, and Mendelssohn. William Cullen Bryant's, Defoe's, Cromwell's, Longfellow's and Faragut's heads were brown. And the downright blondes have included (among many others) Keats and Thackeray.

Human Body Only Machine That Can Do Own Repairs

Your body is the most marvelous piece of mechanism on earth. It is the only machine capable of doing its own repairs. Not only does the body repair itself, but it also manufactures the various materials necessary for repair.

Can you imagine a broken brick mending itself without the aid of human hands? Yet that is what your body does when something goes wrong. All you have to do is to give it the necessary fuel—food and air—and your body will give you long and perfect service, observes a writer in Pearson's London Weekly.

As you know, the object of breathing fresh air is to maintain life. The oxygen we breathe mingles with the red corpuscles of the blood, purifies it, promotes energy, and builds up a natural resistance to germ infection.

When your body is not getting enough oxygen nature gives you a warning. Do you know what that warning is? A yawn!

You do not yawn because you are sleepy or bored. If you were living in the open air you would go to sleep without yawning. And you become bored with company because the room is stuffy, and so you yawn. The yawn is simply an SOS call from the body for more oxygen, and it is a subconscious call.
